This procedure could be penny-wise and pound-foolish. It may make more sense in some countries, for example, to eliminate units that are only marginally effective and to provide modern equipment to the ones that are retained. The initial costs may be higher, but the long-term results could be more effective at a lower recurring cost.

Third, military assistance and related supporting assistance should be considered together in planning security programs. In a few countries, supporting assistance under the economic program is being terminated while military assistance grants continue. It is possible that U.S. interests might be served better in some cases by continuing supporting assistance while scaling down military assistance. This could be particularly useful as a transitional device to help countries assume the operating and maintenance costs now financed with military grant aid.

These three factors highlight the need to plan and coordinate the use of all available security assistance instruments. Special studies addressing these problems are underway within the National Security Council system, but firm policy guidance is needed. These issues probably will take on added importance in the adjustment from war to peace in Southeast Asia.

3. Encouraging Self-Reliance. The United States now makes the basic determination of the amount and kind of military equipment the receiving countries need, and U.S. military missions do most of the detailed logistical planning and costing for them. These decisions necessarily affect the size of their defense budgets. More should be done to enable these receiving countries to estimate their own requirements, to relate them to their budgetary priorities, and to make their military decisions in the light of available resources.

Service training programs in the United States can play an important role in strengthening planning skills and capabilities in the developing countries. Greater emphasis in training should be placed on force structure and logistics planning, and on fiscal and budget programming.

Moving military assistance from a grant to a credit basis also will serve this purpose. Unlike military grants, military credits are subject to the budgetary discipline of the receiving country. The current legislative ceiling on military credits is inconsistent with such a policy. As grants decline, more credits should be made available. Military credits, however, should be used only to finance the purchase of weapons that the developing countries need for their defense and that are within their financial capacity to maintain and operate.

To avoid both an unnecessary arms escalation and a waste of resources needed for development, it is U.S. policy to discourage developing countries from obtaining sophisticated military equipment. Legislative restrictions on the use of U.S. military and economic assistance designed to avoid these problems, however, have not proven effective. In many cases, as the Rockefeller Report points out, the military equipment is purchased elsewhere, while the restrictions leave a residue of ill-feeling toward the United States. Removing them would put the United States in a better position to work out with these countries, on a mature partnership basis, military equipment expenditure policies that are consistent with their means.

Finally, the Task Force believes that large military assistance advisory groups and missions are no longer necessary in many developing countries. In the past, these countries needed the close involvement of U.S. military advisors to ensure the effective integration of U.S. arms and equipment into their forces. By now, however, military officials in most of these countries have achieved adequate levels of professional competence and facility with modern arms. The United States now can reduce its supervision and advice to a minimum, thus encouraging progress toward self-reliance. U.S. military missions and advisory groups should be consolidated with other elements in our overseas missions as soon as possible.

4. Organization and Management. Changes in the organization and management of U.S. security programs would contribute to their effectiveness, clarify their relationship to U.S. foreign policy, and make our objectives and rationale more understandable to the Congress and the American public.

The Task Force recommends:

That security assistance programs be combined in one piece of legislation—and International Security Cooperation Act—separate from international development assistance. This Act should cover foreign military sales and grants, surplus military stocks, supporting assistance, public safety programs, and the Contingency Fund;

That responsibility be assigned to the Department of State for setting policy and for directing and coordinating security assistance programs. In carrying out this responsibility, the State Department should relate security programs to U.S. foreign policy, to global strategies, to changing military technologies, and to the financial capabilities of receiving countries. Administration of military grant and credit sales programs should remain with the Department of Defense; supporting assistance, public safety programs, and the Contingency Fund should be administered by the Department of State.

MILITARY COMMITMENTS: U.S. OVERSEAS DEFENSE ACTIVITIES BEING SCRUTINIZED

The costs, casualties and frustrations of the war in Vietnam have led to a general reexamination of American defense commitments throughout the world. Critics of U.S. Vietnam policy have cited the war as an example of how the United States can virtually unknowingly become entangled in a conflict. They have warned that other U.S. commitments may be equally fraught with the possibility of costly, and perhaps unnecessary, military involvement.

The most striking expression of this concern in Congress was the adoption by the Senate June 25, 1969, of a "national commitments" resolution by a 70–16 rollcall vote. The purpose of the resolution was to correct what many Senators regarded as a constitutional imbalance resulting from continued denial of Congressional authority in foreign affairs. (Weekly Report p. 1111)

A more detailed and long-range Congressional investigation of the scope, costs and political and military ramifications of U.S. military commitments abroad was launched in February with the formation of a new Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee under Stuart Symington (D. Mo.). The Subcommittee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad held closed hearings Sept. 30-Oct. 3 on U.S. commitments to the Philippines and began closed hearings Oct. 20 on the U.S. role in Laos. Eventually, the Subcommittee expects to investigate the full scope of U.S. military commitments. (For details on Symington and the Subcommittee, see Fact Sheet on Laos, p. 2073.)

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield (D. Mont.) announced plans Oct. 19 to reintroduce a resolution, first presented in 1966 and again in 1967, to call for a substantial reduction in U.S. troops in Europe assigned to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Mansfield, who plans to introduce the resolution in November or December, maintains that changed military technology and reduced East-West tensions make a troop reduction possible without adversely affecting the U.S. capacity to fulfill its NATO commitments. (See 1968 Almanac p. 547, 1967 Almanac p. 980, 1966 Almanac p. 75, 82, 430, 436.)

Overseas Troop Deployment. The stationing of U.S. forces abroad is a clear indication of U.S. commitment to the defense of foreign nations. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D. Ark.) June 19, 1969, described American troops stationed abroad as a "de facto commitment to use those forces in the event of an outbreak of hostilities."

The United States in September 1969 had about 1.2 million military personnel stationed abroad (out of total U.S. armed forces of 3.46 million) in more than 33 countries and foreign possessions. In addition to U.S. military personnel abroad, some 26,000 U.S. civilians, 350,000 dependents and 255,000 foreign nationals were attached to U.S. overseas bases. (See tables I and II.)

U.S. overseas military personnel strength has fluctuated since 1945. At the end of World War II, U.S. armed forces totaled over 12 million, a majority of which were stationed in the European and Asian theaters of the war. Strong pressure to "bring the boys home" quickly resulted in a reduction of total armed forces to 1.5 million for the years 1946–1949. The Korean war (1950–1953) sent U.S. forces to a post-World War II high of 3.6 million in 1952, with about 1.1 million men stationed overseas. After the war, the armed forces dropped to 2.5 million in 1960, with 660,000 stationed abroad. The growth of the Vietnam war pushed the armed forces from about 2.6 million (745,000 overseas) in 1965 to 3.46 million, with 1.2 million abroad, in 1969.

The United States in September 1969 maintained 2,270 military installations overseas (not including Vietnam), of which the Pentagon designated 340 as major installations. "Major" installations are defined by the Defense Department as bases "which are large in number of acres occupied or personnel accommodated, or which represent a high acquisition cost to the United States Government, or which are used in support of a principal U.S. military activity or mission." Major bases include large air bases, shipyards and fleet facilities, principal headquarters and command complexes, large communications installations and troop training and housing compounds. "Minor" installations include navigational aids, small communications facilities and small administrative buildings supporting incidental activities.

The largest overseas base (based on acreage alone) is Sondestrom Air Base in Greenland, covering 466,066 acres. Thule Air Base, also in Greenland, covers 338,884 acres. As an example of a minor base, the Defense Department cites a radio relay site in Donnersburg, Germany, covering one acre.

Prior to World War II, the United States maintained military bases only in its Pacific territories and in the Caribbean. The expansion of U.S. bases began in 1941 when Washington exchanged naval destroyers for lease rights in British territories in the Caribbean. Following World War II, the United States constructed military installations primarily in countries to which it was bound by defense treaties. A major reduction in U.S. overseas bases occurred in 1967, when the United States was required to close down over 200 military facilities in France following French President Charles de Gaulle's demand that NATO bases leave French territory.

Foreign Aid. Foreign aid, whether economic or military, has been regarded since the early postwar period as a bulwark to allied and friendly countries against potential enemies. As such, it has been an important element in the total picture of U.S. global commitments. President Truman, in calling for economic and military aid to Greece and Turkey in March 1947, said U.S. policy should "support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation by armed minorities or by outside pressures." President Nixon, while emphasizing the humanitarian reasons for foreign aid, declared May 28, 1969, in his foreign aid message to Congress that aid helped "avert violence and upheaval that would be dangerous to peace." Military assistance to allies, Mr. Nixon added, "helps maintain a world in which we ourselves are more secure."

U.S. economic and military aid in the form of grants or loans totaled $133.5 billion for the period July 1, 1945, to June 30, 1968 (fiscal years 1946–68), according to statistics provided by the Agency for International Development (AID). AID was established in 1962 within the State Department under the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to administer U.S. foreign economic aid, primarily to underdeveloped countries.

More than 130 countries have received U.S. aid since 1945. (For list of nations which have received more than $1 billion in aid, see table III.)

The preponderance of U.S. aid has gone to U.S. treaty allies. The $89.8 billion in aid to allies amounts to about 67 percent of all U.S. aid since 1945. (See table IV.)

Of the $133.5 billion total, $94.7 billion went for economic aid—$55.9 billion in grants and $38.8 billion in loans. Military grants and loans totaled $38.8 billion, of which about $36 billion was in the form of grants. (For breakdown of foreign aid funds by programs and agencies, see table V.)

Approximately $91.8 billion of the $133.5 billion was in the form of grants (economic and military) and $41.7 billion in the form of loans. Repayment of principal and interest on loans totaled $16.7 billion, thus leaving a net aid figure ($133.5 billion minus $16.7 billion) of $116.8 billion.

The distinction between economic and military assistance, according to an AID official, has sometimes been more apparent than real, from the viewpoint of the recipient country. A country turned down by the Defense Department, which administers the Military Assistance Program, for military aid possibly may obtain economic assistance from AID. The funds received for economic purposes may well release funds within that country for the purchase of the military equipment originally sought. If the United States is unwilling to sell this equipment to the country, the funds are released in any case for the purchase of military equipment from other sources.

Sometimes U.S. assistance has been labeled as economic aid but, in fact, has been primarily for military purposes. During the 1050s, for example, "economic" aid to Laos paid for the entire military budget in that country.

Of the $46.8 billion received by NATO allies, approximately $25 billion went to them during the years 1946–1952. During this period, the bulk of the aid was economic assistance to enable them to rebuild war-torn economies. After 1952, aid to the NATO countries shifted increasingly to military aid; and the total volume of aid to NATO countries per year dropped. The NATO countries received about $16 billion from 1953–1961 and about $5 billion since 1962. The drop in the rate of aid ($4 billion per year until 1952, $2 billion until 1961 and less than $1 billion since 1962) is a result of the success of postwar recovery and increasing prosperity in Western Europe. It has enabled the NATO countries to be the primary purchasers of U.S. military equipment since 1962.

The next largest treaty recipient of U.S. aid has been the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO) with $26.7 billion in assistance. There is, however, considerable duplication with the NATO figures, since Britain and France are members of NATO and SEATO. The two countries are the two largest recipients of U.S. aid, with a combined total of about $19 billion. Other SEATO signatories—Pakistan, the Philippines, Thailand, Australia and New Zealand—have received about $7 billion. South Vietnam, a SEATO protocol state not included in the $26.7-billion SEATO figure, received $5.5 billion. Laos, also a SEATO protocol state, received $591 million in economic aid; military aid data on Laos has been classified since 1962; from 1955 to 1962, Laos received $128.5 million in military assistance.

Military Assistance and Sales. The Military Assistance Program (MAP) is part of U.S. foreign aid for which funds are appropriated each year by Congress. The Nixon Administration's request for $2.6 billion in foreign aid for fiscal 1970 included $375 million for military assistance.

MAP is administered by the Department of Defense, which also administers the U.S. Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program. MAP and FMS were run under separate offices within the Defense Department until 1969, when the Pentagon brought administration of the two programs under the same office under the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for military assistance and sales, Air Force Lt. Gen. Robert H. Warren.

The Defense Department views both military assistance and sales as part of a combined program to help maintain the defense capability of foreign nations, since both programs provide U.S. military hardware and training throughout the world. In recent years, the sales program has been increasingly cited by the Pentagon for its contribution to the credit side of U.S. balance of payments.

Warren, in a speech March 26, 1969, described MAP and FMS as "twin instruments of . . . national policy. They complement each other as means by which the United States supports, strengthens and participates in free world collective security. . . . The armed forces we thus support represent an extension of our own defensive posture and a major deterrent to Communist aggression." Warren said that MAP and FMS were administered overseas by 7,100 personnel attached to U.S. military assistance advisory groups, military missions and embassies in 50 countries. Warren added that for budgetary reasons the number of personnel assigned to these functions would be reduced to 5,000 by June 1970.

Under MAP, 78 countries have received military assistance totaling more than $34.6 billion since 1950. MAP expenditures dropped from a high of almost $4 billion in fiscal 1953 to an estimated $550 million in fiscal 1969. (See table VI.)

The FMS program, started in 1962, has increasingly replaced MAP as the major way in which U.S. military equipment and training have been distributed to foreign nations. FMS totaled $5.9 billion for fiscal years 1962–1965, $1.8 billion for 1966, $1.9 billion for 1967, $1.8 billion for 1968 and $1.75 billion in 1969. MAP dropped from $1.7 billion in 1963 to $1 billion in 1966 and has been falling increasingly below the $1 billion figure since 1967. (See table VI.)

SOURCE: Defense Department (International Security Affairs).

The principal reason cited by the Defense Department for the growth of FMS and the decline of MAP is that the postwar recovery of some countries, particularly in western Europe, enabled them to purchase U.S. arms rather than obtain arms in the form of grants under MAP. During fiscal 1962–68, about $8 billion of the total $11.5 billion in sales was made to western European nations. The major western European purchasers of U.S. military equipment were West Germany and Britain. In the Near East, the major unclassified arms purchaser has been Iran. In the Far East, the main purchasers of U.S. arms have been (in order) Australia, Japan, New Zealand and Nationalist China. (See table VII.)

Source: Department of Defense.

Table VII indicates that arms sales to classified countries totaled $974.2 million from 1962–1968 and $432.4 million in 1969. The largest volume of classified sales has been to Israel. The most recent sale to Israel, announced in December 1968 by the Johnson Administration, involved 50 Phantom jet fighter-bombers at an estimated $200 million. During the U.S. visit of Israeli Prime Minister Golda Meir, Mrs. Meir presented to President Nixon her government's request for the sale of additional jet aircraft.

CONGRESSIONAL CONCERN ON ARMS SALES

Rep. R. Lawrence Coughlin (R-Pa.) Oct. 15 placed in the Congressional Record, the information contained in tables VII and VIII. Coughlin, who said the figures had just been made available by the Defense Department, pointed out that it was possible to determine "with reasonable accuracy where the 'classified countries' " are by comparing the regional subtotals of tables VII and VIII. Since the regional subtotals of tables VII and VIII are quite similar for Europe and Canada, Latin America, Africa, and East Asia and Pacific, Coughlin concluded there are few classified sales to these regions. But since the regional subtotals for the Near East and South Asia region in table VII are $668.6 million (1962–68) and $219.7 million (1969) and in table VIII they are $1,639.6 million (1962–68) and $603.3 million (1969), Coughlin concluded that the predominant share of the sales to classified countries falls in the Near East and South Asia region. He listed the following countries as recipients of classified amounts of arms under FMS: Pakistan, Jordon, Israel, Saudi Arabia, Abu Dhabi, Bahrain and Qatar. Iran, according to Coughlin, received classified amounts of weapons under FMS beyond what it received in unclassified weapons. Coughlin also questioned the absence of Ethiopia from table VII. "Nowhere," he said, "is there any indication of the huge volume of weaponry we have supplied to Ethiopia—a quantity of arms valued in excess of our military aid to all other African nations combined." Coughlin criticized the arms sales program. He said the United States "must avoid providing the less developed nations with expensive and useless armaments." He called for inclusion of the question of conventional arms on the agenda of strategic arms limitation talks (SALT).

U.S. arms sales to developing nations were the subject of major Congressional legislation in 1967 and 1968. In 1967, Congress terminated the use of a special Defense Department military assistance credit account to guarantee Export-Import Bank loans for arms purchases by underdeveloped countries; directed the President to terminate loans and assistance to a country that diverted its own resources to "unnecessary" military expenditures; and prohibited the use of military assistance funds and Defense Department credit sales revolving fund to finance the sale of sophisticated weapons to underdeveloped countries. In 1968 Congress placed a $296 million ceiling on the credit sales of U.S. arms to foreign nations. A $75-million ceiling was placed on sales of U.S. arms to Latin America, and a $40-million ceiling on sales to Africa.

Military Training. Within the Military Assistance Program and the Foreign Military Sales program, some 10,000 foreign military personnel are trained annually by the United States at 175 centers in this country and at other locations overseas. Military training includes instruction in the operation and maintenance of military equipment; courses of study in strategy, tactics, and military management; and counter-insurgency.

Table IX (not printed in the RECORD) summarizes U.S. training of foreign military personnel under MAP through 1968. Not included and unavailable is a breakdown of the training of foreign military personnel under FMS. It is known, for example, that Israeli pilots have been trained by the United States to fly U.S. planes sold to Israel.

The training program has been described by a Pentagon official as having long-term value to the United States. "While military equipment and hardware may deteriorate in time, and understanding of American technology and management techniques, and most importantly, of American culture, carries over long after the foreign national returns to his own country," he said. "Such an understanding and appreciation of the United States may be worth far more in the long run than outright grants or sales of military equipment."

Members of Congress, however, have taken a different view of military training, as well as military assistance, particularly with regard to underdeveloped countries. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D Ark.), referring to the brief war in July 1969 between El Salvador and Honduras, July 23 called for an end to U.S. training missions and military assistance in Latin America. Fulbright's point that U.S. training and military assistance armed both sides in the war was supported July 30 by Sen. Frank Church (D Idaho), who said he would offer an amendment to the foreign aid bill for fiscal 1970 to terminate military assistance to Latin America.

COSTS OF COMMITMENTS

The specific costs of maintaining the United States worldwide military commitments have never been singled out by the Defense and State Departments, the two principal Government agencies concerned. Pentagon officials point out that it is difficult to define which forces are maintained solely for the support of military commitments abroad. General purpose forces are available for the defense of the United States and to meet international commitments. For example, the Atlantic fleet defends the eastern seaboard, but it is also available for Latin American or Mediterranean trouble spots. Similarly, troops stationed in the United States could be airlifted to any of a number of crisis areas.

Taking these difficulties of definition into consideration, the Pentagon estimates the total costs of handling all U.S. military commitment overseas, excluding Southeast Asia, but including all other troops assigned overseas or to units assigned to overseas missions, at approximately $15.1 billion per year. This figure also includes the costs of maintaining U.S. military assistance advisory groups, and U.S. military missions in 50 countries throughout the world.

The cost of the Vietnam war, according to the Defense Department, is about $28 billion per year. Using Pentagon figures, therefore, a total cost of $43 billion ($15.1 billion plus $28 billion) emerges as the cost of maintaining military commitments abroad. This figure would amount to slightly more than half the $78–80 billion sum projected by the Pentagon for the defense budget for fiscal 1970.

Congressional estimates of the costs of commitments run higher than the Pentagon's figures. Sen. John Sherman Cooper (R Ky.), in a report in November 1968 of the U.S. delegation to the annual meeting of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization parliamentarians, estimated U.S. costs for NATO alone at $12–15 billion and placed the cost of the Vietnam war in the $30–35 billion range. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman J. W. Fulbright (D Ark) June 26, 1969, used similar figures to estimate the costs of NATO and the Vietnam war to the United States. These estimates would therefore, put the costs of overseas commitments in the $50 billion range.

Returning to the Defense Department's point that it is difficult to isolate the costs of maintaining overseas military commitments, the question can be raised as to whether U.S. forces stationed within the continental United States are more likely to fulfill commitments to defend the United States or to fulfill U.S. foreign commitments. Using this line of reasoning, Sen. Stephen M. Young (D Ohio) Sept. 5, 1969, asserted that the entire defense budget was related to fulfilling worldwide military commitments.

Not included in any of the estimates is the cost of the U.S. foreign aid program, which since its birth in the early years of the cold war has been regarded as a form of commitment to foreign nations. The Nixon Administration requested $2.6 billion in foreign aid for fiscal 1970.

POSTAL STRIKE SETTLEMENT

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CORBETT was allowed to proceed out of order.)

Mr. CORBETT. Mr. Chairman, I have just had a conversation on the phone with James Rademacher, the president of the Letter Carriers Union. He authorized me to tell the House that the postal employees will be back at work tomorrow morning, between 98 and 100 percent of them; that negotiations with the administration will begin soon and will be rather continuous. Furthermore, George Meany, the president of the AFL–

CIO, said that he wanted to keep the salary and the reform legislation as separate units. That is all, and I think it is very good news that this catastrophic strike is apparently over.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CORBETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUCINSKI. It is my understanding—and I am sure all of the postal workers across this country have the same understanding—that Secretary Shultz said negotiations would begin Monday and would last 5 days from Monday. I am presuming at the conclusion of business Friday that the postal workers will have a pay raise approved by Congress and by the President.

Mr. CORBETT. Sir, I was simply quoting the gentleman, and apparently there has been a change in the schedule and negotiations are about to start.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. YATES. I had heard prior to the convening of the House today that the Post Office Committees of both the House and the Senate were going to have a conference on bills already authorized by both Houses. Will that conference take place or not?

Mr. CORBETT. I can say to the gentleman that it should have taken place last January. To date, to this hour, I have heard no final plans about a conference meeting. There has been a little talk about having some preliminary discussions, which I have had enough of. I will be very happy to meet on business but not just to yak.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the gentleman is willing to join at this point in urging the President to undertake to resolve the legislative impasse in order to expedite passage of the bill the House has indicated it wants to see enacted into law to bring fair play to postal employees?

Mr. CORBETT. I do not know what the gentleman is requesting specifically, but if he wants me to try to urge the President to move along at the will of the House and the Senate, why, of course, I would.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I am very happy to yield to my distinguished leader.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope and trust the observations made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania do not mean that the House is going to capitulate and not make a bona fide, legitimate, and vigorous effort for postal reform tied with postal employees pay increase legislation.

Mr. CORBETT. I might say to the gentleman from Michigan that I was only quoting. The reform bill has been reported out of our committee. We have not had a rule granted on it nor is it scheduled for floor action. I am definitely and sincerely in favor of postal reform but the particular plan I liked best was H.R. 4 as it was amended prior to being substituted for by the other bill.

Mr. GERALD R. FORD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania assure me and the other Members of this body that he will help us get that bill out of the Committee on Rules and on the floor and through the House?

Mr. CORBETT. I will be very happy to have the bill brought to the floor but I believe at that time I would join in an effort to restore H.R. 4 as it was prior to the operation.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman, will the getleman yield?

Mr. CORBETT. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YATES. Does not the gentleman agree that the first thing that the Congress should do is try to cooperate and settle this strike and get that out of the way and then do the things that the minority leader wants done?

Mr. CORBETT. No comment.

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for this bill with some misgivings. I am informed by the committee that its passage is necessary in order to give the President authority to make sales on credit rather than cash. He does not need the authority of this bill for cash sales.

The decisions, of course, as to what weapons are furnished to other countries are given to the President by the basic act. Under that act he has decided not to make available at this time to the Government of Israel additional Phantom and Skyhawk supersonic planes they want to purchase. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I am very much concerned with President Nixon's decision even though both the President and Secretary Rogers have said that the situation will be constantly under supervision and that Israel's security will not be permitted to be placed in jeopardy. In my view, the refusal to honor Israel's request at this time does not help Israel's strategic position and may actually be harmful to it. In my opinion, his decision does not help the cause of peace in the Middle East.

Mr. Chairman, on Saturday President Nixon gave four reasons for his action. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the reasons he gave are exactly why he should have reached the opposite conclusion. Let us look at his reasons in the light of the existing situation.

The first reason given by the President was that he hopes by his action to bring about a ceasefire in the Middle East. Well, all of us agree that a ceasefire is eminently desirable. Mr. Chairman, which of the belligerents has broken the ceasefire agreement and which of the belligerents refuses now to observe it? Certainly, it is not Israel that is to blame. A ceasefire agreement was broken first by President Nasser on May 1, 1969, when he openly declared that he would no longer be bound by it and then he proceeded to shatter it with bombardments of Israeli positions along the Suez Canal, a breach which he has continued ever since with growing casualties among the Israeli troops. Israel had no choice except to take to the air in an effort to protect its men and its defenses.

I am concerned that the President's decision will encourage the Arab nations to continue to violate the ceasefire rather than accept it, and to press even more strongly what President Nasser has described as "a war of attrition" to compel Israel to use up her existing supply of planes.

The second reason given by the President was that the flow of arms into the area should be reduced. That, too, is very desirable, but why should Israel be made the victim of such a decision? The other belligerents have already received immense quantities of armaments. An embargo which would have halted the flow of arms to all belligerents from outside nations sometime ago would have permitted equitable treatment of all the belligerents, but that did not occur. It is not occurring now. As a matter of fact, the President's decision really plays the Soviet's game for while the United States has stopped the flow of arms into the area, the Soviet Union continues to arm the Arab nations to the teeth. Through the largesse of the Russians, the Arab nations have received a massive flood of weapons, including the latest and most sophisticated types in greater quantities than they possessed before the 6-day war. And now, deliveries have begun to Egypt of the most advanced Russian ground-to-air missiles, the SAM–III, which deliveries have been accompanied by hundreds of Soviet experts to supervise their installation and the training of the Egyptian forces.

Moreover, there is the agreement by France to furnish 110 supersonic Mirage fighters to Libya, which has openly, by admission of the new rulers of its government, declared itself to be Egypt's partner in the struggle against Israel. I think it would be naive to accept, as does President Pompidou in his public statements, that such planes will not be used against Israel. If war should come again to the Middle East, or even if it is threatened, if the leaders of the Arab cause decide they should be employed against Israel, who is there to stop their being so used? The President's decision at this time, after the commitment by the Soviets and by France to the Arab nations, amounts to a unilateral embargo to the detriment of Israel.

The third reason given by the President is that we seek a political settlement which, is a desirable goal, as well. Certainly, it is one to which the Government of Israel subscribes. But, Mr. Chairman, in every public statement the Arab States have refused even to consider the possibility of a political settlement with Israel. If the Arab States now reject all attempts to initiate a political settlement, does it make sense that they are more likely to embrace such a proposal in view of the President's decision halting the flow of planes to Israel? I would hope the administration's action is not intended to require Israel to accept a settlement which would be inimical to the preservation of her national security, and which, like the settlements of 1948 and 1956 might bring another war rather than peace.

Secretary Rogers stated that Israel is vastly superior in the air, that its pilots and personnel are more capable than those of her adversaries, all of which is true. But does this mean, Mr. Chairman, that Israel must lose its superiority in the air before this Nation will make additional planes available? Must she lose her pilots and her planes in sufficient numbers to bring into question her supremacy in the air before she can depend upon additional planes from the United States to strengthen her air force?

Mr. Chairman, depriving Israel of additional planes at this time in the face of overwhelming Russian support is playing a dangerous game with Israel's security. Certainly, the Arab nations have more men, they have more tanks, they have greater numbers of other weapons, they have a superiority in the number of planes available by at least a ratio of 6 to 1. At what point will it be agreed that the so-called balance of power will be achieved?

Deferral of Israel's request in my judgment is an unfortunate mistake. Psychology is important and I hope and trust the President's decision will not give the Arab nations cause for belief that Israel has lost its major source, nay, in today's atmosphere, its only source of planes.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I just want to associate myself with the gentleman's very lucid and very helpful statement. I would also like to add that I am puzzled and disturbed that yesterday this House saw fit to loan submarines to Greece and other countries that are neither democratic nor threatened with attack by their neighbors at the very moment the administration has decided it cannot sell weapons for self-defense to a democratic country that is threatened with aggression by its neighbors.

I would be glad to support a bill that would make arms available to democratic governments threatened by aggressors and deny them to dictatorships threatened by nothing more than their own oppressed people. But I am afraid it is impossible to discover what funds or what arms are to be made available to what governments for what purposes under the provisions of the bill we are considering today. It is outrageous to dangle Israel while we bolster juntas in places like Brazil and Greece. I want to join in Mr. YATES' protest, and I will have more to say about that situation soon. I appreciate the gentleman taking the time to make his statement today.

Mr. YATES. I appreciate the gentleman's statement.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge the President to reconsider his decision. Israel is the best friend that the United States has in the Middle East and is a friend whose existence and strength foster the best interests of the United States and our foreign policy in the Near East.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the gentleman and commend him for a most enlightening and certainly a most commendable presentation.

Like the gentleman, I am convinced that while peace can come only through negotiation, Israel's ability to repel attack is its main line for survival. Any weakness from that position would be devastating, not only to the survival of the State, but to our own country's best interest.

It is contended that Israel has clear air superiority in skill over the Arabs. But the question is, for how long? The intrusion into the Middle East of Russian soldiers to man Egypt's newly acquired SAM–3 missiles is an obvious immediate step toward upsetting this so-called balance.

How long can Israel maintain her strategic superiority, her technological lead and the confidence of her fighter pilots? In simple numbers, however, this little bastion of Middle East freedom is incredibly outnumbered, yet she perseveres.

Let us look at the facts. Israel has merely 300 fighter jets. The combined air forces of Egypt, Jordan, Iraq, Syria, Saudia Arabia, Algeria and the Sudan have over 1,000 jets—three times the number of Israeli jets.

To cross the Middle East's vast stretches of desert, Israel has only 1,200 tanks; the Arabs have twice as many.

And if hostilities come down to direct combat, the Israelis are sorely outnumbered. The Arabs can field nearly half-a-million soldiers, while Israel has 220,000 troops, of which only 75,000 are now in the field.

Israel is fighting for her existence. The added jets are needed to dramatize to the Arabs that military force cannot alter the presence of Israel as a secure, independent nation in the Middle East.

Mr. YATES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, I find it extremely strange that there is this much concern about this particular situation. When we denied ourselves of air superiority in South Vietnam as of Halloween in 1968, withdrawing air support and reducing that support to allow sanctuary—and leaving our foot soldiers beleaguered on the ground. What else does the gentleman expect from Uncle Sugar?

Mr. YATES. I do not see the point the gentleman makes. The gentleman knows there is a vast difference between the two situations if he seeks to make a comparison to the war in Vietnam and what is going on in the Middle East.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ADAIR. I think in view of the gentleman's earlier remarks, it is appropriate to quote from a part of Secretary Rogers' statement of yesterday in which he said, referring to the President of the United States.

In doing so—that is, reaching the decision upon the matters of jets for Israel—he has instructed that close watch be kept on the military balance in the area. The United States will be in a position to provide additional as well as replacement aircraft promptly if the situation requires it.

Mr. YATES. I am aware of that statement. I referred to it in my earlier remarks as having been made by the Secretary—or the President.

The point I make is still true and that is that this Nation plays a dangerous game when it justifies cutting off planes to Israel through use of the phrase "balance of power." What is meant by that phrase? The means of war are overwhelmingly in favor of the Arab States—in men—arms—sophisticated weapons. Now there is the latest addition to the list with the SAM III missile accompanied by Russian technicians. That is why I say that I think Israel's security may be jeopardized by our rejection at this time. The Arab States will be heartened by the announcement that the United States is not making these planes available to Israel at this time. I hope it will not encourage them to the point where they may take some sort of drastic action.

Mr. ADAIR. I am sure the gentleman is aware, though we cannot give the details in public debate, of the figures relative to the various types of materiel available to the countries of the Middle East. While recognizing the point of what the gentleman is saying, he may find some comfort in the fact that there is this continuing serious effort, to look at conditions in that area and to measure carefully and as definitely as the human mind can the need for military equipment.

Mr. YATES. I should like to point out to the gentleman that those statistics appear in this morning's issue of the New York Times.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, the President's decision yesterday to deny Israel's request to purchase Phantom and Skyhawk jets is a major error. The planes are necessary, not only for the short run, but to insure Israeli strength and to serve as a clear signal that the United States is firmly committed to support of Israel.

At present, Israel pilots and technicians so exceed in their expertise the abilities of their Arab counterparts that Israel holds the military advantage. However, the losses which Israel suffers must necessarily lead to eventual military disadvantage, unless these losses are replaced. And even the most skilled of technicians cannot indefinitely maintain aircraft used daily.

Consequently, denial of the jet sale poses the very real threat to Israel of eventual military disparity vis-a-vis her Arab neighbors, who are sated with Soviet arms. Only the sale of United States jets can maintain the parity created by Israel's skill and spirit offsetting Arab numbers.

Added peril for Israel lies in the failure of this administration to make clear its commitment to Israel. This failure is signaled by the rejection of Israel's request. More than that, the rejection is a signal to the Arab States, and to their Soviet mentor, to maintain their intransigent resistance to negotiate a meaningful and lasting peace with the Israelis. Only by the administration's clearly declaring

U.S. support will the Arab nations be forced to recognize that their interests compel negotiation and that they will gain no advantage by continuing to await U.S. compromise.

I am concerned that the administration may attempt to use the language of section 5 in the bill before us, H.R. 15628—language which was adopted by the House Foreign Affairs Committee before the President's decision—as an expression of congressional support for that decision. No such interpretation is warranted.

Section 5 expresses the sense of Congress that—

(2) (T)he President should be supported in his position that arms will be made available and credits provided to Israel and other friendly states, to the extent that the President determines such assistance to be needed in order to meet threats to the security and independence of such states, . . .

At the time this language was adopted by the committee, I am sure that the Members believed that it expressed their support for the sale to Israel of the jets it needs for its self defense, and that it would signal this country's support of Israel. Thus, it stands as no endorsement of the determination announced yesterday by Secretary of State Rogers that Israel does not need the planes. Secretary Rogers stated at his press conference:

In our judgment, Israel's air capacity is sufficient to meet its needs for the time being. Consequently, the President has decided to hold in abeyance for now a decision with respect to Israel's request for additional aircraft.

Section 5 is in no way an endorsement of that decision.

I think the potential misuse by the President of what I believe is section 5's real intent—firm and forthright support of Israel—is a clear possibility. We need only recall passage by this House of H.R. 613 last fall. Innocuous on its face, H.R. 613, which spoke of President Nixon's efforts to negotiate a "just peace" in Vietnam was interpreted by the President as "supporting his plan for peace." The passage of section 5 should not likewise be interpreted by the President as support—this time, of his rejection of the jet sale to Israel.

I think a particularly well thought out and fair analysis of the situation is that presented by Stephen S. Rosenfeld in the March 22 issue of the Washington Post, which follows:

UNITED STATES, RUSSIA WRITE STRATEGIC EQUATION

(By Stephen S. Rosenfeld)

If, as I concluded from a three-week trip to the Mideast, the existing situation as between Egypt and Israel is bad, but not unrelievedly so, then it still is quite possible that the situation could be made much worse by the actions of either the Soviet Union or the United States.

The reason is that, while the political policies of Egypt and Israel are necessarily their own, the role of Moscow and Washington as arms suppliers to the respective parties inescapably makes them the formulators of the region's strategic equation. For them, separately or together, to change that equation would be to invite fate to slice what slim ties of restraint still hold the region back from all-out war.

One can curse Egypt for dishonoring the ceasefire at Suez and one can rake Israel for bombing around Cairo, but the fact is that the arms suppliers provided the physical means for these local political decisions to be carried out and no recipient can be expected to permanently foresake an advantage which he thinks a particular use of a piece of available hardware will bring him. Once one side has an artillery piece or the other has an aircraft, those weapons will be used.

The strategic equation now in force is one which gives Israel a plain superiority in the air. The basis of that superiority lies in three things: Israel's post-1967 borders; its higher level of technology, organization and motivation; and its advanced airplanes, especially the Phantom jets. Having the Phantoms is what enables Jerusalem to exploit its advantages in borders and in technology and motivation.

It is unquestioned in the Mideast that Israel's air superiority prevents the outbreak of full-scale war. Otherwise Egypt would have the capacity and confidence to start back across Sinai. This could change, however, if the Russians took over Egypt's air defenses in a serious way.

Direct Soviet participation in Egypt's defenses would not only relieve Cairo in yet another way from accepting its own relationship with Israel. It would diminish Jerusalem's military advantage, and when this advantage is reduced—in reality or in Cairo's perception, the most powerful deferrent to war in the Mideast goes with it. Soviet participation also would heighten the chances of the United States being drawn in on Israeli side.

A like result—diminution of Israel's military edge and a consequent increase in the probability of war—would also flow from a halt in Phantom sales to Israel, or from a precipitate slowdown in deliveries or from a decision to tie deliveriees to Israel's acceptance of conditions which Washington alone deemed appropriate for Israel's needs.

Israel, never far from hysteria about its survival anyway, would be tempted to strike a major blow before its advantage had evaporated. Egypt, never far from unrealism, would abandon altogether its remaining thoughts of a political solution and would itself begin to prepare for the next round.

This does not mean that Israel must receive the full number of Phatoms sought, on the terms of its choice. It does mean that neither Arabs nor Israelis must be given grounds to question Israel's continuing power, if war is to be deterred.

To be sure, another major American purpose—gaining favor with the Arabs—would be forwarded by a Phantom halt or slowdown.

The United States would still have to cope with those tensions which make third-world going tough for all developed states. It would still have to cope with the Soviet Union, which is not inhibited in its Mideast policy by a concern for the survival of Israel. Nonetheless, a decision to deprive Israel of the arms it considers vital to its security would surely be appreciated by the Arabs. That is precisely what they understand by the world "even-handed."

So what should the United States do? In brief, it should sit back and squirm nervously for a year or two or five or whatever it takes for the current sky-high peak of emotion and fear to level off. The responsibility for a settlement is the region's own; the parties have no reason to respect an arrangement they do not make themselves. The responsibility for the region's strategic equation is unavoidably that of Washington and Moscow, the leading suppliers, and Washington has good reason to provide the hardware allowing Israel to hold up its end—to deter war, to encourage the parties to accept each others' reality, to block hostile Arab-Soviet hegemony in an important region, and to keep faith with the Mideast's one friendly democratic state. As good a way as any to protect the United States' various investments (which, by the way, are being eagerly solicited by Egypt) is to make clear and to make sure that they serve Arabs fairly as well as Americans.

Even without an Arab-Israeli dispute, the Mideast would be in tumult and foreigners would have a hard time hanging on. But desperate as things are, the region has arrived at a certain plateau three years after the war, and efforts by over anxious outsiders to improve the situation are just as likely to have a contrary result. Arms and passions are there aplenty but there also exists such other commodities as common sense, serious leadership, hard work, the desire to get on with building nations and lives, and even boredom. Steadiness is required inside the region and outside, too.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Coughlin amendment.

Reference was made on the floor a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. COLLIER), whom I do not see at the moment, to the effect that the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency did not testify before the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. While that is true, the Arms Control Agency did file, within the last few weeks, an excellent report entitled "World Military Expenditures, 1969" which was before the committee, as it is before us today. And in that report it set forth the news, which I found profoundly saddening, that since 1964 a large part of the world's growth—and I quote—"has been dissipated in higher military expenditures, rather than contributing to the improvement of living standards." And the Agency concluded by stating, "The report shows the rise in military spending continuing" and "The world remains the poorer for it." That is precisely the reason for the Coughlin amendment. We need to gain control over the arms race. I hope the amendment is adopted.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REUSS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Does the gentleman think $10 million was well spent to get that kind of a report? I would think that almost anybody with a reasonable education could write the same thing.

Mr. REUSS. Anybody with a reasonable education, or without a reasonable education but with good instincts, could write that conclusion, but the numerous pages, with which I hope the gentleman will familiarize himself, of statistical data on the arms race is a valuable contribution, and I think the record should show that the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency is doing its job.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. REUSS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GROSS. The distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, (Mr. MORGAN), in response to Mr. COLLIER, talked about expenditures for the Disarmament Agency. I can recall, not many years ago, when there was a disarmament setup in the White House and it cost less than $1 million a year. That was headed by the great disarmer, Harold Stassen. He did not accomplish very much, but he accomplished exactly as much, in my opinion, in terms of disarmament, as has been accomplished through the expenditure of the $10 million a year.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment would add a new section to the bill to express the sense of Congress, that multilateral discussions be initiated with countries on the control of worldwide trade in armaments, to commence a general debate in the United Nations with respect to the control of conventional arms, and for the President to use the power and prestige of his office to control the national distribution of conventional weapons. I talked this over with the ranking minority member of the committee. The committee has no objection to incorporating this amendment in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, there are a number of aspects of our foreign military sales program of which I do not approve, and I am happy to support the pending amendment by Messrs. COUGHLIN and REUSS as a move in the direction of limiting the worldwide traffic in conventional weapons.

The bill was also improved in committee by the recommended addition of sections 4 and 5. In section 5, the Congress not only goes on record as being in favor of military assistance to Israel to the extent necessary, but as virtually inviting the President to submit supplemental requests for authorizations if the funds provided in the bill prove insufficient for that purpose.

As I said in the House last night, I am dismayed at the President's action with regard to Israel's request for additional jets. The gallant Government and people of Israel may rest assured that continuing pressure will be maintained on the President for reconsideration and reversal of this decision, especially in the light of the dangerous new types of assistance now being rendered to the United Arab Republic by the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. COUGHLIN).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I would like to call to the attention of the Committee the language on page 3 of the bill, the portion of the committee amendment which is designated as section 5.

Under (2) of section 5 are the words:

> The President should be supported in his position that arms will be made available and credits provided to Israel and other friendly states, to the extent that the President determines such assistance to be needed in order to meet threats to the security and independence of such states.

This language was very carefully worked out during the consideration by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I think it reflects accurately the concensus of the committee that the United States does have a legitimate concern for the security interests of all friendly states of the Middle East and not just Israel. The Middle East resolution which was enacted, I believe, in 1954, set forth very clearly the concern of this Government for their integrity and security and independence of all such states.

In placing the language "and other friendly states" in this committee amendment, it is my feeling that the Committee on Foreign Affairs was attempting to show that the committee does have an interest in the security problems of other friendly states of the Middle East area besides Israel.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, what does the gentleman consider to be a friendly state? Would he define that?

Mr. FINDLEY. I will have to say that list could very well change from year to year, but I think we would have to class Lebanon and Jordan in that category, and they do have security problems at the present time. The amendment does not specify which states, and I think it unnecessary to do so. The purpose of the language is to give assurance that our concern is not confined exclusively in the Middle East to the friendly state of Israel.

Mr. WOLFF. I wonder if the gentleman would in any way define "friendly"? Would an action such as Libya took in tossing us out of the bases in Libya be interpreted to mean that Libya would be considered a friendly state?

Mr. FINDLEY. I would presume, inasmuch as the U.S. Government very promptly extended diplomatic relations to the new regime in Libya and has not altered that relationship that that our Government so considers Libya as a friendly state.

Mr. WOLFF. Would the gentleman consider Iraq friendly as well?

Mr. FINDLEY. I did not by listing Jordan and Lebanon mean to imply that no other states should be classified as friendly. The term "friendly state" has often been defined by statute and is widely understood.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I think anyone would be pretty hard put to find a friendly country around the world.

Mr. FINDLEY. It is just day by day.

Mr. GROSS. And those who are friendly we penalize with economic boycotts and sever diplomatic relations with them.

The gentleman from New York raises a good question, but it is a horrible one to have to try to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. BROOKS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration (H.R. 15628) to amend the Foreign Military Sales Act, pursuant to House Resolution 879, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. GROSS

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. GROSS. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Mr. GROSS moves to recommit the bill H.R. 15628 to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 351, nays 26, not voting 53, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days to extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BROOKS). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

WARNED PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS THAT POSTAL STRIKE WAS READY TO EXPLODE

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on February 19, 1970, I warned the President and the Congress that a postal strike was ready to explode in New York City at any moment unless immediate and decisive action was taken on the postal pay issue. This warning went unheeded.

I again warned that this country was threatened with a precedent-setting national strike of postal workers similar to that occurring in Italy. It was necessary, I stated on that occasion, for the postal employees of Italy to strike in order to obtain benefits. I prayed then that it would not be necessary for the postal employees of America to do likewise. In this instance, we have seen what has occurred. I warned of the dangerous practice on the part of the administration tying postal reform to pay raises. Today the Nation is faced with a national dilemma. The situation has come about as a result of an absolute miscalculation on the part of the administration—an inability to sense the pulse of the times.

On March 10, 1970, 16 of my New York City colleagues and I sent a letter to the Postmaster General urging that emergency salary adjustment procedures, authorized under title V of the United States Code be instituted in the New York area for postal workers. No response was received to our request. This action could have provided instant relief to the plight of New York's postal workers pending the outcome of legislative action.

Mr. Speaker, the eruption of the strike action in New York was almost inevitable in the face of all this indifference.

After the strike commenced in New York City, I received a letter from the Postmaster General of the United States at my home. I probably hold the distinction of having received the only letter mailed in New York City during the strike. It was delivered to me at 5:30 a.m. by a postal inspector and it stated:

> You may be in a position to render unique assistance in handling the problem that now faces us in midtown New York City. Accordingly, I respectfully request that you return to Washington at the earliest practicable time to discuss with me, personally, the situation with respect to Branch #36, NALC of the AFL–CIO. I shall be ready to meet with you at your convenience.

There is no doubt that I might have been helpful in effecting an agreement with the New York City postal workers. However, after traveling back to Washington and calling on the Postmaster General, it proved to be of no avail whatsoever.

Yesterday, I was again contacted by the Postmaster General's office. This time I was asked to check and give them a reading of the temperament of the postal workers and make recommendations to the Postmaster General's office. After speaking to the leadership of the local postal unions, I offered the General Counsel of the Post Office Department a proposal which, hopefully would have reversed the trend and broken the stalemate. It was a simple proposal calling on the administration to agree to have the postal union leaders of New York City sit in on the negotiations. The union leadership and I felt that this small concession would have given the administration an opportunity to demonstrate its good faith. The leaders of the unions would have therefore been in a better position to convince their members to return to work as soon as possible.

Within half-an-hour after making this proposal, I received a call from the Postmaster General's office flatly denying this request. This is another illustration of "Rome burning while Nero is trying to fiddle."

And what do we do instead? The President called the military into New York City to handle the mail. Mr. Speaker, I ask, Why only New York City? Why not Chicago or some other large city? Has

New York City been written off completely?

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that a much more rational and up-dated approach should have been applied to this very real and potent labor problem. I am convinced that impartial negotiations must be commenced at once outside the realm of political considerations.

Today I offered the President a feasible alternative to his policy of Executive saber-rattling.

My present proposal is realistic, viable, and sound. One that could end this seemingly impregnable impasse within hours.

Mr. Speaker, I hereby call on the President and the Postmaster General to remove the postal strike from the arena of party politics and return it to the realm of conventional negotiations. I ask the administration to appoint an experienced and internationally known public-employee labor expert, Mr. Theodore Kheel, to act as mediator in this dispute.

Mr. Kheel has already agreed to serve in this capacity, and I am certain he can be the catalyst for a quick return to work and an ultimate acceptable agreement.

If the administration agrees, the union leadership would arrange for a special meeting to urge postal employees to return to work. After 72 hours of mediation, the progress of negotiations would then be reported to the full membership for a final vote.

Mr. Speaker, the union leaders and I feel this would be an acceptable plan to the membership. The administration need only respond and machinery would start immediately to return the striking postal workers to their jobs. I am confident that acceptance of this proposal would be the first step toward an early cessation of the postal strike and the beginning of a nationwide reversal of the strike trend.

I consider the postal strike crisis of such serious proportions that also I recommended to the House leadership that the Easter recess be canceled so that we all may deal with this catastrophic issue until it is resolved. I have been informed that this will be done and I am pleased to know that my colleagues will devote themselves to this crucial national emergency.

Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by the administration to do all I can to end the postal strike in New York. However, in spite of all my warnings, all my recommendations and proposals, and all my direct interventions, I have received no cooperation from either the Postmaster General or the President. Regardless of an obvious indication that I have been "used" in bad faith, I persevere nevertheless. I fully realize the gravity of the situation in New York and other large cities. It is sad that postal service to the people and our business communities has been interrupted. It puts a heavy burden on all of us. My concern therefore is to return full mail services to all Americans as well as providing fair treatment for the postal employees. The postal workers deserve our fullest sympathy because they are a dedicated group of Americans who for years have served our people faithfully and consistently in spite of a long history of lagging pay and poor working conditions.

THE POSTAL SITUATION

(Mr. HELSTOSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the gentleman from New York, the distinguished gentleman (Mr. BIAGGI) for his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, it is apparent we are living in an era of crises.

Without question one of the gravest of these is the uprising of our postal workers. While we cannot condone wildcat strikes, we can and must understand the reasoning behind the one presently taking place in the Post Office Department.

It is self-evident that our postal workers are among the lowest salaried in the Nation. They, individually and through their organization leaders, have for months been imploring the Federal Government to recognize this and to take the necessary corrective action.

We did move to recognize this fact, but carried nothing to a conclusion because of a threat of a Presidential veto. Right now there is a bill in conference that will take a major stride toward giving the postal workers the wage comparability with private enterprise that the Congress and a President promised them through law in 1962.

We, through our votes for the bill now in conference, supported the 1962 law and in so doing honored the pledge given our postal workers eight years ago. But some in Congress ran for cover when the White House threatened a veto of the bill if Congress passed it.

I say let us ignore the veto threat and move to carry out the intent of the 1962 law, and do the thing we know must be done to accord decent and fair treatment to the postal workers.

During the weekend, I met with about 400 postal workers in my congressional district on the present difficulties. I report their attitudes were fair and reasonable. They are just tired of being pushed around as they struggle to support their families on the small salaries given them.

Added to their difficulties is this period of wild inflation which is driving everyday costs of living higher and higher. Postal workers see and hear of neighbors in private enterprise getting wage increases to cover at least part of the rising costs while they are asked to exist on indistinct promises. It is enough to drive anyone to take part in an action designed to wake from their slumbers those holding the purse strings of Federal Government.

Again I say, let us get on with the business at hand. Let us ignore the veto threat coming from Pennsylvania Avenue. Let us start acting like a coequal branch of Government and do what we have to do and let the chips fall where they may.

There is one other phase of the present situation I would like to comment on. We all realize that the Nation and its people cannot long stand a freeze on the interchange and delivery of mail, but is the answer calling out the troops to take on an assignment which is not a part of their military duties? In the minds of many this may be unconstitutional. Further, does anyone have the right to ask a military man to serve to, in effect to, try to break a strike that can be quickly ended by the Congress and the President conforming to the law passed in 1962.

At this point I would like to place before the House a copy of a letter addressed to President Nixon, under date of February 19, 1970, by Mr. Frank Hornik, a postal organization officer of Clifton, N.J., calling to his attention the employee unrest in the Post Office Department because of broken promises.

CLIFTON, N.J.,
February 19, 1970.

HON. RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the United States,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On October 15, 1969 I wrote a letter addressed to you in reference to the pledge you made to the Postal Employees in a speech to Postal Officials in Washington, D.C., on February 10, 1969.

By all reports and what I have read in your Budget Message, the pledge is a forgotten item in Washington, D.C.

May I remind you, that it is not a forgotten item among the vast majority of your Postal Employees.

You probably do not have too much time to see them, or to listen to them. Quite possibly, you may not even care.

I think it would be wise to have your postal officials pay a little more attention to what is in the minds of the average postal employees.

While the law may say that the Federal Employees do not have the right to strike, this does not of necessity mean that they would not strike.

It happened in Canada and in Great Britain, and it can happen here.

It is about time that the people in Washington recognize the fact that every Federal Employee is a citizen of this country.

You have some 2,800,000 Federal Employees, of which at least 25% are Postal Employees. If only 50% of the Postal Employees are married, this is a potential of some 1,050,000 votes at a minimum.

This means that by your remarks in the Budget Message, you are casting 1,050,000 people in the role of second class citizens.

Mr. President, I think it is about time the people in Washington woke up to this fact, and began to remedy this situation.

Respectfully yours,

FRANK HORNIK.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. GILBERT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, in the congressional district I represent, the 22d Congressional District of the Bronx in New York City, Federal troops today are attempting to deliver the mail.

It is unlikely that these men will make a decent job of it, no matter how well motivated they are. Men do not become postal clerks and letter carriers overnight, not even at the decree of the President of the United States.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if the presence of these troops in New York City does not spark violence—and I sincerely pray that it does not—it at least makes a mockery of the collective bargaining proposition.

How absurd it seems that we will commit our men and our money by the billions to fight a land war in Asia we cannot win, do not want to win, for a country whose leaders violate every precept of democracy. Yet at the same time we cannot increase an $8,400 annual salary by $20 a week for honest, hard-working American men because it would be inflationary.

How absurd that the Congress seeks to provide Nationalist China with submarines and jet planes when it will not provide its American postman with enough money to feed and clothe his family?

There are some basic questions at stake in this postal crisis that have nothing whatsoever to do with the legality of whether public servants have the right to strike.

The postal workers were promised a raise. They were told how much it would be and when it would come. They were lied to, no matter how good the reasons for that deception might seem to be.

The unions attempted to bargain in good faith. These strikes did not come about overnight. The complaints of the postal workers have been festering for years, always neglected, always put off by administration after administration. If you deliberately starve a man, you cannot be much surprised if he will not carry your lunch basket.

Most important, the administration triggered this strike when it insisted that reform be a part of the pay increase. The reform issue is a valid one. But it is a complex issue that should be fully debated. By insisting that its proposal is the only valid reform, and by insisting that only by passing reform can the workers get their pay raise, the administration callously attempted to ram a highly controversial issue down the throats of its impoverished postal employees.

Mr. Speaker, I was among those who did everything within his power to help avert the strike. The strike is a tragedy, for those risking their livelihoods and their careers, for those who depend upon the mails for their survival and for the millions of Americans who must suffer one way or another because of it.

The President would have been better advised not to have sent in the troops but to have begun earnest—and honest—negotiations with the workers. It is still not too late for him to rectify the mistakes his administration has promulgated in this labor dispute.

I urge the President to withdraw his troops, start meaningful negotiations for immediate pay increases and to set the reform issue aside until passions permit reasonable discussion.

Much has been made, Mr. Speaker, of the precedent set by this strike. Let the workers win, it is said, and other unions will follow their example. I say there is an earlier precedent of American law that we must follow. And that is that America is the land of liberty with justice for all. There will be no justice in this instance until the postal workers win a liveable raise. Let us achieve justice first; it deserves precedence over precedents.

WELFARE—A GUARANTEED INCOME

(Mr. LANDRUM asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LANDRUM. Mr. Speaker, many in this House are deeply disturbed by administration proposals to replace the present welfare system with what amounts to a guaranteed income. One major fear is that a guaranteed income will not encourage people to work—despite the so-called incentives offered by the bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. Instead, I think the bill will make more people dependent.

The priorities of this bill are wrong. They are: cash, first; food, second; and work, third. I believe there should be a reversal in priorities: work, first; food, second; and cash, last.

The bill was explained very clearly by my colleague on the Ways and Means Committee, the Honorable AL ULLMAN, of Oregon, in a radio interview with Mr. Arch N. Booth, executive vice president, Chamber of Commerce of the United States, presented over the Mutual Broadcasting System on March 19, 1970. I include the transcription of this interview at this point in the RECORD:

WELFARE—GUARANTEED INCOME

An interview in Washington, D.C., with Congressman Al Ullman (D-Oregon) by Mr. Arch N. Booth, Executive Vice President, Chamber of Commerce of the United States on What's the Issue, over the Mutual Broadcasting System, March 19, 1970.

Mr. BOOTH. Perhaps one of the most interesting, the most misunderstood and the most controversial programs in many years, is the one before the current Congress which is called a sweeping plan to revise our present system of welfare payments to the needy. Now the system is much in need of revision—no doubt about that. The disadvantage of the plan being offered is that it would be a first step toward a wholesale plan of giving something for nothing to millions of people. It would add about 15 million people to the welfare rolls who are not now eligible for payments.

Let's get the record straight right at the outset. We in the National Chamber are for helping those who need help. Those who are blind, disabled or elderly, or for some reason unable to work—we are on record as believing that support of those who have no potential for self-support is a public responsibility. But for those who are able to work, welfare should be coupled with occupational rehabilitation and the opportunity to earn a living.

Now to discuss this interesting program we have with us today the fourth ranking majority member of the House Ways and Means Committee, Representative Al Ullman of Oregon. He'll try to help us understand the current proposal and some of its long-range implications.

Mr. Congressman, the House Ways and Means Committee has just reported out this bill which is labeled, H.R. 16311, the Family Assistance Act of 1970. Its supporters tell us that it's a total reform of our present welfare system. To what extent do you believe it is a reform bill?

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Booth, this is a very complicated piece of legislation and obviously there are reforms in it. But I think rather than a welfare reform bill, this bill changes the whole direction of our welfare program, the whole concept. What we are essentially doing is adopting the basic essentials of the guaranteed income program, or a negative income tax approach, to the whole problem and if you want to call that reform I guess you could. But the reason I voted against the bill was that I wanted a true welfare reform. I wanted to build on the reform bill that we passed three years ago, and establish real increased work incentives in the program, and build up child care and build up your special projects in your government agencies—for on-the-job training and all of this kind of thing which, we think, has established a real good basis of experience. We are departing from that now and taking a totally new course in welfare.

Mr. BOOTH. Now this new course is embodied in a bill a hundred pages long. Do you think many people have read it or could read it? And readily understand what it would do? And what it would reform?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, very, very few people will, of course, understand it at all. And that is the reason, I think, that there is so much support for it now. There is so little understanding of it.

Mr. BOOTH. I think it's pretty well agreed that the present welfare system, especially the program known as Aid to Families with Dependent Children, AFDC, has some grave shortcomings that ought to be corrected in one way or another. Now, how does the House bill purport to solve these problems?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, of course, let's start by saying that there is no such thing as a good welfare bill. It is impossible to cope with this difficult problem in a way that's really satisfying to anyone. And it is true that the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program did have a lot of very serious inequities in it. But the basic problem is, how do you improve those things? What do you do? Here, in place of trying to make the great improvements that I think we need, we've changed the whole course.

Mr. BOOTH. As I understand this rather complicated bill, it provides not for fewer people on welfare, but for more. It doesn't call for less spending relief, but for more. Do you agree that that's fair?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, of course, this is the obvious. On the very face of it, what we're doing by including—the first thing we are doing is nationalizing the whole welfare program. In other words, the social security system will take over welfare and you'll have federal welfare offices in every community. The second thing we're doing is adding—we're tripling the size of welfare by adding the so-called "working poor". It's an income supplement program—the guaranteed income approach.

Mr. BOOTH. The Administration claims that about 4 million families will be on this new welfare program. Does your estimate agree with that figure? Are the heads of these families unemployed?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, my figures show that, as of now, we have about 1.7 million families on welfare, and I think that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare now estimates that this bill would put approximately 4.6 million families on welfare, or virtually trippling the welfare rolls.

Mr. BOOTH. And are the heads of the families unemployed?

Mr. ULLMAN. No. In the existing program, the 1.7 million families, most of these welfare people are families without a father in the house. Some of the states have unemployed fathers programs and maybe 25% of the families in this existing program have fathers in the house. But these people we are adding—almost 3 million new families—will have working fathers in the house. This is the working poor. These are mostly families with working fathers in the house.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, as I understand it—what you are saying is that at least half of these families heads are what could be called fully employed? Are all of these employed people below the poverty income level?

Mr. ULLMAN. No. This is just one of the many discrepancies in the bill. The program will make supplemental federal payments, income supplement payments from the federal treasury, to a lot of so-called "working poor" who are above the poverty level.

Mr. BOOTH. All right, then, the income supplement level would pay federal relief even to families who are above the poverty income level, if I've understood you correctly?

Mr. ULLMAN. That is right.

Mr. BOOTH. Would it pay welfare to all families who are above the poverty level?

Mr. ULLMAN. No, of course not.

Mr. BOOTH. If not how do you justify paying it to some and not to all?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, I just don't think we can.

Mr. BOOTH. As I understand the bill—the head of the family that qualifies for welfare and is not now employed, must either go to work or take training for a job. Is that the intent of the bill?

Mr. ULLMAN. That certainly is—and that is a basis on which it is being sold. But I think this is the real nitty grit of our whole problem. You cannot, with the present mechanism and the financing we have—you can't possibly get the kind of training for these people. You can't. In the first place you can't cope with the enrollment problem of these people in our employment service offices. And in the second place—there are just not the funds in the bill to provide training for these people.

Mr. BOOTH. Let's clear up one point then. What will the program do for families where the father is fully employed?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, where the father is fully employed but earns below the levels in these tables, then they will fill out an application form, send it in, and start receiving a check from the federal government as an income supplement.

Mr. BOOTH. To bring him up to the poverty level?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, to bring him up to the levels—the poverty levels—and the levels for payment are different as we have indicated. But to bring him up to the level of our guaranteed income program.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, regardless of where a family lives—in a city or a rural area—must the breadwinner take a better paying job than the one he now has. Or must he take training on the side to improve his working skill?

Mr. ULLMAN. We are talking about all these additional 3 million families coming on to the welfare rolls. They will have to register with the employment service. But the employment service is going to be so swamped. There's no way in the world they can handle a reshuffling of jobs. Theoretically though, if a better job is offered—one that they are suited for—they are supposed to take it. If they don't take it, then, theoretically, they are taken off of the rolls, but this doesn't mean the family is. If you have, for instance, under this program a family with ten children and a father and mother—they will get 4,000 dollars straight welfare from the Federal government. I'm not talking about the supplement. The supplement will go clear up to 8,500 dollars I think. I think they can earn that much additional and still get a federal supplement. But if the father then refused to work he would be taken off, but the family would get the 3,500 dollars rather than the 4,000 dollars. Now I understand this will be paid under the bill through a complicated arrangement through a third party.

Mr. BOOTH. What does the record show? How successful has the employment service been in placing in jobs these unemployed fathers who are on welfare?

Mr. ULLMAN. A number of the states have had extensive experience in the unemployed fathers welfare program, and the record of the employment service has been very low. About 8 or 9 per cent of the unemployed father recipients who have gotten jobs have been placed by the employment service. I don't think we can expect any better record. In fact, we can expect a far poorer record, because the employment service just isn't set up to cope with this kind of a problem.

Mr. BOOTH. What happens if a family head refuses to register with the employment service, or refuses to accept a job if offered to him? Or if he refused to take training?

Mr. ULLMAN. Then supposedly, he's taken off the welfare roll, but his family remains on.

Mr. BOOTH. Can the head of a family be compelled to take any kind of a job?

Mr. ULLMAN. No, no. If he refuses to take a job, then his name comes off. As I have indicated, however, his family will still continue to get payments.

Mr. BOOTH. According to Administration spokesmen, the main reason for paying relief to families with fully employed fathers is so that the fathers will no longer desert their families. Has it been your finding that AFDC has actually caused fathers to desert their families?

Mr. ULLMAN. No. I think there has been a great deal of misunderstanding on that. There is extensive experience to show, as a matter of fact, that this program has not caused desertion of fathers from the home, as has been indicated.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, let's shift for the moment to Medicare or Medicaid. The costs are much higher than expected. Probably more taxes will be required to cover future costs. This new welfare expansion bill will cost the federal government about $5 billion to start with, as I understand it. Won't this require more taxes, if we're to have a balanced budget?

Mr. ULLMAN. Obviously, it will, and the trouble with this kind of program is that $5 billion is only a start. Once you start down this road of income supplements, there is only one way the costs can go, and that's up. Because obviously, the first thing we're going to hear is—how can a family live on that 1,600 dollars. As a matter of fact, before this thing gets out of the Senate, I would expect them to up the ante a great deal. And the pressure will be to raise the payments constantly. So, we're starting down a road, that seems to me, one of mushrooming welfare costs. And we're obviously going to have to raise taxes to do it. It's a matter also of national priorities. We're going to have to go for other things in our economy and in our society, if we are going to take this route.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, isn't it rather unusual that just looking at this thing from the standpoint of broad strategy—isn't it rather unusual for the very conservative, prudent and knowledgeable Ways and Means Committee to offer a bill of this kind to the Congress? A bill which is going to cause us either more deficit spending, or which will lower the value of our dollars, or call for more taxes.

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, in my judgment, it's almost unbelievable that, first, this Administration—which is supposed to be conservatively oriented—would propose this type of program. To me this is almost unbelievable—and it's equally unbelievable that the Ways and Means Committee would be reporting it out with such an overwhelming majority. Three of us voted against it. I think that, in large part, it's because of a misconception as to what we're really getting into. And I think if we could really all sit back and view the road that this will lead us on—I think we would really stop and look and listen and take the other route.

Mr. BOOTH. I think we ought to talk about that for just a moment. Because as citizens and tax payers, we all sat back in holy horror and righteous indignation about the "welfare mess". Now, came the Administration with a reform bill, which they said would "cure the welfare mess". And so we embraced it and said, "This is wonderful". We want to cure it and so what has happened? What has happened is that the conservative and the highly respected Ways and Means Committee comes along with a bill to implement the Administration's recommendation—and now we're confronted with it, as a people. And we are having difficulty in understanding it, because we don't read the hundred pages of language in the bill. And so we're accepting labels, aren't we, and assuming that this is a cure for the welfare mess where, as a matter of fact, it may actually be making the welfare mess worse. Am I saying the wrong things?

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, I would certainly agree with you. But I would add that the Ways and Means Committee was, in a sense, on the spot. The Administration had recommended strongly this new approach and the pressures were on and I think they generally caved in to the pressure. But this is really an almost unbelievable thing. Vice President Agnew, for instance, has come out strongly in favor of this program. I served on the Intergovernmental Relations Commission. The Vice President was a member when he was Governor of Maryland and I remember this same problem coming up in that Commission. And he, at that time, took quite a different position on this whole problem. I think there are some basic false assumptions that lead people to fall for that kind of a program. But I think that it's such a dangerous route that we're taking that I hope that there is some way that we can alert the people to the problems before we get started. Because once you get started down that road of the guaranteed, there's no way of turning back, in my judgment, and this is why we need really to stop, look and listen.

Mr. BOOTH. I think you said a great truth there. I think most people in this Country, who are thinking about the protection of the basic principles of this Country, and the fundamental principles which underlie our business system, which is the greatest in the world, and is one of the greatest things this Nation has going for it—I think they would stop, look and listen. If they understood the facts—and the difficult thing is that the rhetoric is good here—and reform in the welfare program is in itself a good thing, isn't it?

Mr. ULLMAN. Now let me say this. Now I am strongly in favor of reforming the welfare system and I think you are, too.

Mr. BOOTH. Yes.

Mr. ULLMAN. I think we need to iron out some of the basic discrepancies. We need to improve our program. We need to do better with the lot of the poor people. But this isn't the route. What we need is real reform. We need to build on the reform we adopted two years ago. We have a WIN program that's really just starting to function. We should build on that. We should extend our day care, so that mothers can work. We should adopt extensive on-the-job training programs and special work projects, and the JOBS program with private industry should be expanded. These are all a good solid basis. Now, I'm not opposed to a federal basic minimum on welfare. I think that maybe this is a good step forward and an increased federal participation. I think that where we part are two basic areas: First, adopting the guaranteed income approach and adding these 3 million new families onto the welfare program. And the second thing is, neglecting the work or training requirement. This is being sold on that basis—and yet there's not the money nor the vehicle nor the mechanism in this program, to put people to work. And so I think these are the things that give me, and I'm sure you, cause for a great deal of concern.

Mr. BOOTH. Yes. Now, Congressman Ullman, whenever anyone challenges a program which is before the Congress, and before the people, you're always put upon to say—What is your alternative? You must not be just against things. Now you've just been stating some very acceptable alternatives.

Mr. ULLMAN. Well, as a matter of fact, I'm introducing legislation with some others that will accomplish this, that will establish a basic federal minimum of approximately the 1,600 dollar base, and that will eliminate the portion of the bill that we're opposed to—the guaranteed income portion. But in its place, we'll beef up the work incentive program and the child care and on-the-job training, and JOBS, and put the kind of funds into those programs that they're going to need to function.

Mr. BOOTH. Let's emphasize just one word that you've used there several times, and that's the word—incentive Isn't it an acceptable substitute or alternative to this plan to offer incentives to people to enable them to better themselves in the job market and become productive people? Isn't that an effective alternative to this business of putting about 15 million additional people into a giveaway position where their incentive will actually be destroyed? Isn't an incentive a better answer than force?

Mr. ULLMAN. Absolutely. And the big mistake, the fallacious assumption these people are making is that this income formula will somehow be an incentive to get off welfare. This simply is not going to work that way. The best incentive is to provide a people with the kind of job training they really need and the kind of job guidance. The WIN program has got a team of counsellors. It is a very effective approach. People want to improve themselves. We should give them an opportunity to job training, on-the-job training. We should have extended child care, so that mothers can work. And I think a lot of them do want to work. All of these things are real incentives—and that's what we need in the program.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, is it fair to say that most of these incentives are—or all of these incentives that you've just been talking about are already in existence—in the present program?

Mr. ULLMAN. They are all already in existence, but we need to build on them and increase the funding, and increase the programing, because we have already proven that they work.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, how much of the added costs of what we have been talking about would be for payment for fully employed fathers not now on welfare?

Mr. ULLMAN. The minimum cost is 2 billion dollars a year, and I think it will be far more than that, when we get into the actual experience.

Mr. BOOTH. Now, isn't it true that once we accept that 2 billion, or whatever the figure may be, we have started down a road from which there will be no returning?

Mr. ULLMAN. As I said before—there's only one way this program can go in cost, and that is up and up and up. And I'm afraid that once we get started the pressures will be so great that this will be an expanding part of the budget that we can't control.

Mr. BOOTH. We, as a people, then had better do some hard thinking, hadn't we, before starting down that road, and going well into deficit financing or more taxes and, at the same time, destroying the incentives of people to better themselves individually.

Mr. ULLMAN. I hope we can do it in time to keep from going down this road.

Mr. BOOTH. And now, our sincere thanks to Representative Al Ullman of Oregon, fourth ranking majority member of the House Ways and Means Committee for this explanation of the so-called Family Assistance Act of 1970.

Each week this program brings you a discussion of the choices facing free Americans. This is Arch Booth, speaking for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and inviting you to join us next week at this same time.

THE LATE GEN. JAMES EARL RUDDER

(Mr. CABELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, with the death of Gen. James Earl Rudder on Monday in Houston, Texas and the Nation have lost a brave soldier, a fearless leader, a distinguished public servant, and an outstanding educator. And I have lost a great and good friend.

His record, both in war and in peace, will be best remembered through the inspiration he has given so many young men at the most formative time in their lives.

Few individuals in the history of Texas A. & M. University have emphasized in such dramatic fashion the ideals upon which this school can base its claim for existence, the principles which motivated all of those who have attended and throughout the rest of their lives.

Following his graduation from A. & M. in 1932, General Rudder was commissioned a second lieutenant in the U.S. Army Reserve, but went into civilian life as a teacher in Brady High School, working also as the coach of its football team. Within 5 years, he had moved into the college ranks at John Tarleton, and in 1941 he was called to active duty as the clouds of the impending World War II darkened Texas skies.

It was not until the Allied assault upon the Nazi fortified coast of Europe at Normandy that the young Texan's great dedication and courage first came to national attention. Then, as the organizer and leader of the famed Rudder's Rangers Battalion, he successfully scaled the formidable cliffs overlooking the landing site even though his battalion lost half its men and Rudder, himself was twice wounded.

While this was a high point in a distinguished career, General Rudder will best be remembered for his many years at his alma mater, where he was appointed as vice president, later president, and finally head of the entire university system. From 1958 until his death, he saw the university enrollment more than double in size and it was he who welcomed the first young ladies as students into a once male university.

Today the stature of Texas A. & M. University as a molder of men and women in the finest and most admirable traditions is his most enduring monument and one for which he will be most remembered by a sorrowful State.

CONSUMER LEGISLATION

(Mr. ROSENTHAL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, the consumer task force of the Democratic Study Group held a press conference today to discuss the status of key consumer legislation and to announce introduction of six new consumer bills. These proposals will provide the consumer with significant point-of-sale information which is not now available. They will contribute, we hope, to the urgent need to make the free enterprise system operate more effectively. Our goal, as the following statement makes clear, is to encourage American business to compete for quality.

I also include the text of the bills and an explanation at ends:

STATEMENT OF DEMOCRATIC STUDY GROUP TASK FORCE, MARCH 24, 1970

(Rep. Benjamin S. Rosenthal, Chairman; Rep. Joseph Karth, Vice Chairman; Rep. Shirley Chisholm, Rep. Bob Eckhardt, Rep. Michael A. Feighan, Rep. James M. Hanley, Rep. James J. Howard, Rep. Torbert Macdonald, Rep. Abner J. Mikva, Rep. Joseph G. Minish, Rep. Patsy T. Mink, Rep. John E. Moss, Rep. Richard L. Ottinger, Rep. Fernand St Germain, Rep. Neal Smith, Rep. Robert O. Tiernan, Rep. Lester Wolff.)

As members of the Democratic Study Group Consumer Task Force, we are here today to propose new and necessary consumer legislation and to pledge ourselves to the enactment of this legislation before the adjournment of the 91st Congress.

We make these proposals both as an affirmation of our responsibility as legislators to meet the problems of a complex marketplace; and in recognition of the failure of the Nixon Administration to meet its responsibilities to America's 200 million consumers.

In August 1969, the DSG Consumer Task Force issued a report highly critical of this Administration's record in the area of consumer protection. The past eight months have forcefully confirmed our view that the consumer programs of the Nixon Administration are marked more by their timidity and failure than by their boldness and success; that consumers are being promised more but given less; and that this is an Administration which is basically apathetic to the plight of the consumer. We conclude that this Administration is not putting any of its important resources, except rhetoric, into the consumer struggle.

Our earlier report also recommended the enactment of a wide-ranging program of consumer legislation. The overwhelming majority of these bills have not enjoyed the support of the President and his leaders in Congress.

In short, "benign neglect" may be an overly generous description of the Nixon Administration's performance in the consumer protection field.

While the voice of the consumer is being heard ever more loudly across America, those voices speaking for the Administration on consumer matters are confused, muted and, ultimately, ineffective.

For every consumer bill proposed by this Administration—and there may only be one of merit, that to expand the Federal Trade Commission's authority to curb abuse in the marketplace—there are many more which are decidedly inferior to legislation already pending before the Congress. Consider and compare for example, the Administration's class action legislation, its fish inspection and product warranty bills, its proposal which deals with the mailing of unsolicited credit cards, and, weakest of all, its bill to reorganize the federal consumer protection apparatus.

For every consumer victory achieved from within the government's decision-making apparatus, such as the 30% fat limitation requirement for sausage products, there are dozens of defeats for the consumer cause.

Consider, for example, the anti-consumer lumber standards promulgated recently by the Commerce Department; the Justice Department's consent order in the California anti-smog device case; the Attorney General's tampering with the report of the White House Task Force on Oil Import Quotas; and the refusal of the Federal Reserve Board to order more honest advertising of Christmas Club savings accounts.

Today, President Kennedy's "Consumer Bill of Rights" and President Johnson's outspoken commitment to consumerism, have given way to the statement of a Nixon Cabinet officer that consumerism may have gone too far and the belief expressed by a presidential counselor that government shouldn't get any more involved in consumer protection but should leave that work to groups like the Better Business Bureau!

And so, we are here today to propose to the Congress and to the country some new and, we believe, innovative consumer reforms, ever mindful of the fact that many good "old" bills, which have originated in the Congress, deserve immediate attention.

Let me at this point mention two of them: one is a bill, now pending before the House Government Operations Committee, to establish a powerful, centralized Federal Consumer Protection Agency. This bill stands in contrast to the Administration proposal which would further fragment an already splintered federal consumer protection apparatus and which would establish the Attorney General as the chief consumer protector in Washington. The Consumer Protection Agency, because of its independent status, would be shielded from much of the kind of political pressure that has undermined the effectiveness of the existing Committee on Consumer Interests.

The DSG Task Force endorses the independent agency approach to federal consumer protection and urges the enactment of H.R. 6037, as amended.

The Task Force also urges the enactment by the House of the Eckhardt Class Action bill, without the weakening amendments proposed by the Administration. The Eckhardt-Tydings approach is the only one which would permit direct access by the consumers to the courts, without the burdensome condition-precedent of a law suit by a unit of government.

Permit me now to summarize and explain briefly the new legislative "Consumer Rights Package" we are introducing today. Our judgment is that in a time of runaway inflation, legislation which provides consumers with information necessary to make the most economical purchase, is useful in the fight against the high cost of living. Our legislative package seeks to accomplish that end:

(1) The "Better Labeling Act" represents a recognition of the fact that the Fair Packaging and Labeling Act promised more than it could deliver. Three years after its enactment, consumers are still confronted with labels which fail to provide information about contents sufficient to permit value comparisons between brands; and with packages which frequently conceal subtle contents shrinkage.

The Better Labeling Act would require nutritional information on packages; it would require a statement of drained weight on canned and frozen fruits and vegetables and percentage of major ingredients labeling on combination food items; and, finally, it would require that where a food or toilet goods manufacturer reduces the contents of his packaged product, the front panel would have to state that fact for a minimum of 90 days.

(2) The "Appliance Dating Act" would require that all appliances and consumer electronic products be dated with the month and year of manufacture; and would authorize the Federal Trade Commission to regulate the use of "model year" designations.

This bill is based on the findings of the Special Consumer Inquiry that a significant number of appliances on the market today were manufactured two, three or more years ago and frequently represent an outdated technology.

(3) The "Consumer Food Grading Act" would establish an expanded and more relevant consumer food grading program so that quality comparisons of food can more easily be made. This is particularly important at a time when private store brands are competing with national brands for consumer acceptance. A confidential and unreleased study by the U.S. Department of Agriculture shows that the existing consumer food grading program is almost universally misunderstood and, as presently administered, of no value to the consuming public.

(4) The "Drug Dating Act" would prohibit the sale of prescription and over-the-counter drugs, beyond an established expiration date. The Food and Drug Administration has recently expressed concern over the reports that over-aged drugs are sometimes sold to consumers and that consequent drug deterioration may be responsible for some injuries and deaths.

In 1965, for example, three patients at a New Jersey institution for the mentally retarded died from the ingestion of over-aged carbarsone tablets taken for the treatment of an intestinal disorder. Analysis of the drug showed that over-age had caused a chemical change in the tablet with fatal results.

Similarly, a large number of deaths and serious injuries documented by the Food and Drug Administration, have been traced to the ingestion of outdated tetracycline, which had undergone a hazardous chemical change.

This bill would require an expiration date for drug use—both to the pharmacist and to the ultimate consumer.

(5) The "Performance Life Disclosure Act" is responsive to the consumer's need for information about the durability of certain consumer products. It merely seeks to pass along to consumers performance-life information already known to manufacturers.

It is long past the time when consumers should be told how long a given brand of light bulb or color TV picture-tube can be expected to operate under normal conditions of use.

(6) The "Durable Products Dating Act" would require expiration dating of those "durable" consumer products determined by the National Bureau of Standards to be of a type whose performance life is diminished by prolonged storage. Dry cell batteries and photographic film are examples of products whose performance life becomes diminished after prolonged storage.

We do not suggest that this package of consumer bills will cure all of the abuses found in today's marketplace. But its enactment would, we believe, go a long way toward meeting the need for better "point-of-sale" information to consumers. We are convinced that the ready availability of such information will permit consumers to shop more economically than is now possible and will reduce significantly the high cost of living.

A bill to require that certain processed or packaged consumer products be labeled with certain information, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that this Act may be cited as the "Better Labeling Act."

SECTION. 1. Any packaged consumer food product shall be labeled by the processor in conformity with the regulations of the appropriate agency with the following information:

(a) With respect to processed food products, an analysis of nutritional contents including fat content, vitamin and protein value, fats and fatty acids, calories and any other nutritional information deemed appropriate;

(b) In the case of any canned or frozen product whose packing medium constitutes a substantial proportion of its total weight, the net weight and drained weight of the product;

(c) In the case of any combination food item, the major ingredients by percentage weight after processing determined pursuant to the regulations of the appropriate agency.

SEC. 2. (a) The label of any packaged consumer product which, prior to any given date, has been packaged in a container of any given net content (by weight or by volume), and after that date is packaged in a container of a different net content, shall conspicuously set forth the amount of the difference. The information required by this section shall be carried on the label of the product involved for such period of time, not less than 90 days, as the appropriate agency deems necessary to give adequate notice to the public.

SEC. 3. The appropriate agencies shall prescribe regulations to carry out the purposes of this Act. These regulations may contain such classifications, differentiations, or other provisions, and may provide for such exceptions as are necessary or appropriate to effectuate the purposes of this Act, to prevent circumvention or evasion thereof, or to facilitate compliance therewith.

SEC. 4. Whenever it appears to the appropriate agency that any person has engaged, is engaged, or is about to engage in any act or practices constituting a violation of this Act or any regulation issued under this Act, it may in its discretion bring an action, in the proper district court of the United States or the proper United States court of any territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, to enjoin such acts or practices, and upon a proper showing a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond. Upon application of the appropriate agency, any such court may also issue mandatory injunctions commanding any person to comply with any regulation of the appropriate agency under this Act.

SEC. 5. For each willful violation of any regulation under this title, the appropriate agency may assess upon any person to which the regulation applies, and upon any partner, director, officer, or employee thereof who willfully participates in the violation, a civil penalty not exceeding $1,000.

(a) In the event of the failure of any person to pay any penalty assessed under this section, a civil action for the recovery thereof may, in the discretion of the appropriate agency, be brought in the name of the United States.

SEC. 6. For the purposes of this Act, the term "appropriate agency" means

(1) In the case of Section 1(a) only, the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

(2) In the case of any non-food consumer product, the Federal Trade Commission.

(3) In the case of any packaged food product which contains 3 percent or more of meat as determined under the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Agriculture.

(4) In the case of any packaged food product which contains less than 3 percent meat as determined under the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare acting through the Food and Drug Administration.

H.R. ——

A bill to require that certain durable products be prominently labeled as to date of manufacture, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Appliance Dating Act".

SECTION 1. Any consumer durable product determined by the Federal Trade Commission to be of a type whose design and/or performance features frequently or customarily are, or are represented to be, changed on an annual or other regular or irregular periodic basis to such an extent as to make its date of manufacture or its model-year designation a relevant descriptive factor in connection with sales thereof to consumers shall be prominently labeled by the manufacturer as to the month and year of manufacture and, if required by the Federal Trade Commission, as to the model year. Such label shall be permanently affixed to any article pursuant to this section and may not be removed or altered.

SEC. 2. All of the powers and remedies, both administrative and judicial, conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission for the administration or enforcement of any one or more provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act are conferred upon the Federal Trade Commission for the administration and enforcement of this Act.

H.R. ——

A bill to provide for the development of a uniform system of quality grades for consumer food products

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Consumer Food Grading Act".

SECTION 1. (a) The Secretary of Agriculture, after consultation with representatives of consumers, producers, and processors, shall develop and, by regulations, promulgate a system of retail quality grade designations for consumer food products expressed in a uniform nomenclature.

(b) The Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to establish, by regulation, the manner in which the system of consumer food grade designations shall be displayed and disseminated to the public. Such dissemination shall specifically include a program of consumer education to make grade designations widely known to consumers.

SEC. 2. (a) In developing and updating quality grade standards, consideration shall be given to the nutritional quality and wholesomeness of food products, as well as the acceptability of the products.

(b) To the extent consistent with paragraph (a) of this section, grading methods in use prior to the enactment of this Act may be utilized by the Secretary of Agriculture in establishing the system of cosumer food grade designations.

SEC. 3. Any food products sold more than nine months after the promulgation of applicable quality standards in accordance with this Act shall either be conspicuously labeled in accordance with such standards or shall be conspicuously labeled "not quality graded by the United States Department of Agriculture".

H.R. ——

A bill to require that certain drugs and pharmaceuticals be prominently labeled as to the date beyond which potency or efficacy becomes diminished

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Drug Dating Act".

SECTION 1. Any prescription and over-the-counter drug or pharmaceutical determined by the Food and Drug Administration to be of a type whose effectiveness or potency becomes diminished after storage, shall be prominently labeled, under regulations promulgated by the Food and Drug Administration, as to the date beyond which the product shall not be used.

SEC. 2. (a) The date of products not dispensed by prescription only shall be prominently labeled on the product by the manufacturer.

(b) The "Beyond Use" date for products dispensed by prescription only, shall be prominently stated on the label of the product, by the retailer dispensing the product;

SEC. 3. The Food and Drug Administration, after reasonable consultation with all interested parties, shall have authority to establish the "Beyond Use" dates for all applicable products and the manner in which they shall be labeled.

H.R. ——

A bill to require that certain short shelf-life durable products be prominently labeled as to the date beyond which performance life becomes diminished

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Durable Products Dating Act".

SECTION 1. Any "durable" consumer product determined by the National Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce to be of a type whose effective performance life begins to deteriorate in storage prior to actual use, shall be prominently labeled by the manufacturer, under regulations promulgated by the Bureau, as to (a) the date beyond which the products effective performance life begins to diminish; and (b) the date beyond which the product should not be used.

SEC. 2. The National Bureau of Standards, after reasonable consultation with all interested parties, shall have authority to establish the dates for all products required by section 1 of this Act to be dated.

H.R. ——

A bill to require that durable consumer products be labeled as to durability and performance-life

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Performance Life Disclosure Act".

SECTION 1. Under regulations and guidelines to be established by the National Bureau of Standards of the Department of Commerce, manufacturers of durable consumer products, including appliances and electronic items shall disclose on a conspicuous label or tag affixed to each item sold at retail to consumers, the performance life, under normal operating conditions, of each manufactured durable product.

SEC. 2. Where products covered by this Act are comprised of separate major components for which separate performance-life designations can be determined, such as designations shall be established and separately disclosed on a label affixed to each product.

SEC. 3. (a) After consultation with all interested parties, the National Bureau of Standards shall have final authority over the selection of products and components of these products for which performance-life designations shall be made and over the determination and establishment of performance-life for those products.

(b) In establishing the performance-life for a product, the Bureau shall take into consideration the extent to which the manufacturer's guaranty or warranty, if any, covers the performance life of the product.

SEC. 4. The Federal Trade Commission is authorized and directed to prevent any person from violating the provisions of this act in the same manner, by the same means and with the same jurisdiction, powers and duties as though all applicable terms and provisions of the Federal Trade Commission Act were incorporated into and made a part of this act.

SEC. 5. One year after the effective date of this Act and every year thereafter, the Bureau shall report to the Congress those products for which performance-life designations have been made.

SUMMARIES AND EXPLANATIONS OF LEGISLATION PROPOSED BY CONSUMER TASK FORCE OF THE DEMOCRATIC STUDY GROUP, MARCH 24, 1970

BETTER LABELING ACT

Reason for bill

The Fair Packaging and Labeling Act of 1966 states that "packages and their labels should enable consumers to obtain accurate information and should facilitate value comparisons." Nevertheless, three years after the enactment of that Act, consumers are still confronted with food labels which fail to provide relevant information as to package contents and with packages which frequently conceal subtle contents shrinkage.

Unit-pricing legislation, already pending before the Congress, will go a long way toward eliminating the confusion resulting from package-size proliferation. However, much more needs to be done to accomplish the legislative purpose of the packaging act.

Summary of proposed bill

Processed consumer food products shall be labeled by the processor, in conformity with the regulations of the appropriate agency, with the following information:

(1) With regard to certain processed food products, nutritional statements including fat content, vitamin and protein value, fats and fatty acids, calories and any other nutritional information.

(2) In the case of any canned or frozen product whose packing medium constitutes a substantial proportion of the total weight, the net weight (i.e. weight of product and liquid together) and drained weight (i.e. weight of product without liquid) of the product. [This provision is in response to findings that (a) a large proportion of canned and frozen fruit and vegetable products is liquid and (b) certain brands of canned fruits and vegetables consistently offer more product and less liquid than others.]

(3) In the case of any combination food items, the major ingredients by percentage weight after processing [analysis of combination items such as beef stew, chicken n' dumplings, certain soups and others, indicates that certain brands consistently offer more of the major expensive ingredients and less sauce, liquid and filler-type material. Presently, however, there is no way for consumers to determine percentage of ingredients.]

(4) If a food or toilet-goods manufacturer reduces the contents of any of his products, he shall state that fact on the front panel of the package for a period of not less than 90 days. [This requirement is in response to a finding that hundreds of package food and drug store items are subtly reduced in contents without a reduction in price and without the consumer's knowledge.]

(5) Act will be administered by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Federal Trade Commission and the Agriculture Department, as specified, according to the product.

APPLIANCE DATING ACT

Reason for bill

Information has been developed that large numbers of appliances and consumer electronics products such as televisions, phonographs, and radios, which were manufactured two, three, four or more years ago, are sold to unsuspecting consumers as "new".

While technically these items are unused, the consumer presently has no way of knowing whether the product he is buying is the latest model or, if model-year designation does not pertain, whether the product represents the latest and best technological and design effort of the manufacturer. One woman wrote, for example, that an electric hair dryer she purchased as "new" was actually three years old and inferior in performance to the company's newest product. The price she paid was only a few pennies less than the latest improved model.

Summary of proposed bill

Any consumer durable product determined by the FTC to be of a type whose design and/or performance features frequently or customarily are changed, or are represented to be changed, on an annual or other periodic basis to such an extent as to make its date of manufacture or its model year description a relevant factor to consumers, shall be prominently labeled by the manufacturer as to the month and year of manufacture and, if required by the FTC, as to the model year. Such label shall be permanently affixed to any article and may not be removed or altered.

CONSUMER FOOD GRADING ACT

Reasons for bill

Quality comparison is one of the most important considerations for the consumer. Just as unit-pricing legislation would establish a mechanism for making cost comparisons between competing package sizes and info-tag a mechanism for making performance comparisons between competing manufacturers' products; so too, a device is needed which would provide consumers with "point-of-purchase" quality information about competing brands of food.

When we buy fresh meats, we are informed about the comparative quality of different cuts through the use of official USDA grades. However, when we buy canned or frozen fruits and vegetables, fresh produce, dry cereals, or the rapidly proliferating variety of precooked products and meals, we almost never are.

By and large, the consumer in this country does his food buying deprived of any knowledge of the quality grades of the items offered for sale.

Those consumer food quality grades that have been developed by the USDA are expressed in a non-uniform nomenclature and are antiquated and ambiguous.

For example, in dairy products the grade designation denoting the top quality for process cheese is "Quality Approved"; for cheddar cheese it is "AA". For fresh fruits and vegetables, US No. 1 denotes not the top quality, but a much lower quality. Moreover, the grading system is utilized by food manufacturers on a "catch-as-catch can" basis.

The food manufacturer buys the farmers products by USDA grades; the wholesaler, the the large institutional buyer and government agencies buy from the food manufacturer by specified quality grades. Only the consumer buys blind.

Summary of proposed bill

The Secretary of Agriculture, after consultation with representatives of consumers, producers and processors, shall develop, and by regulation, promulgate a uniform system of retail quality grade designations for consummer food products. In developing quality grade standards, consideration shall be given to the nutritional quality and whosesomeness of food products, as well as to acceptability factors.

Any food product sold at retail more than nine months after the promulgation of applicable quality food grades shall either be labeled in accordance with such standards or shall be labeled: "Not quality-graded by the USDA".

DRUG DATING ACT

Reason for bill

There is convincing scientific evidence that certain drugs and vitamin products lose potency or efficacy after prolonged storage. The Food and Drug Administration has expressed concern over reports that drugs over-aged are sometimes sold to consumers and that consequent drug deterioration may be responsible for some injuries and deaths.

Summary of proposed bill

Prescription and over-the-counter drugs and vitamins which are determined by the FDA to be of a type whose effectiveness or potency becomes diminished after storage, shall be prominently labeled as to the date beyond which the product should not be used.

DURABLE PRODUCTS DATING ACT

Reason for bill

The performance life of certain durable consumer products is adversely affected by prolonged storage. Batteries and film are examples.

An expiration date would reduce the likelihood that such products would be purchased after substantial performance life has been lost.

Summary of proposed bill

Would require expiration dating of those "durable" consumer products determined by the National Bureau of Standards of a type whose performance life is diminished by prolonged storage.

PERFORMANCE-LIFE DISCLOSURE ACT

Reason for bill

It is well established that manufacturers of consumer durables carry out extensive performance testing of their own products, including performance-life.

One of Betty Furness' major accomplishments in the consumer field was the public acceptance of her view that appliance and electronic manufacturers should report to consumers on product durability or performance-life. Certainly, consumers should know whether, under normal operating conditions, light bulb "A" will outlast light bulb "B"; or which TV picture tube will last longest. Many of these answers are now known by manufacturers.

Summary of proposed bill

Under regulations promulgated by the National Bureau of Standards, durable consumer products, including appliances and electronics items, will bear a label disclosing the expected performance-life under normal operating conditions.

The Federal Trade Commission shall enforce compliance with the Act.

PRESIDENTIAL VETO THREAT CAUSED POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. MADDEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Constitution provides for three separate branches of our Federal Government—executive, legislative, and judicial.

President Nixon is the first President in my memory to violate the spirit of our Constitution by indirectly threatening to veto proposed legislation when it is still under debate and consideration in the legislative branch of our Government. Last summer, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee passed and the House approved a postal salary bill. The Senate delayed passing the postal pay bill until December 12, 1969, primarily on account of the White House jockeying and negotiating in an effort to compel the legislative body to accompany the salary bill with the separate post office reform legislation. These two bills were entirely separate and dealing with dissimilar legislative problems concerning our postal system. The President further inflicted a threat against the postal salary bill when, in his January budget message, he failed to provide sufficient funds for the pending postal salary increase.

This indirect interference by the executive department with the legislative process of the Congress was an unwarranted threat on congressional procedures and jeopardized the separate salary legislation already passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives. Had the executive department not interfered with these two separate pieces of legislation, demanding legislative action on both, the salary bill would have been signed into law last fall, to the satisfaction of the postal workers throughout the Nation. This Presidential interference by indirect and implied threats with the legislative process of the Congress has brought about the outrageous tieup of our postal system, to the detriment of welfare from which our Nation is now business, industry, and the economic suffering.

Mr. Speaker, I might go further and state that the President's veto on January 26, 1970, of the over $19 billion HEW appropriation bill was also overshadowed by the executive department's interference with our legislative process while this bill was being debated in both bodies of the Congress. The House passed this appropriation bill for HEW back on July 31, 1969, but by reason of implied executive department threats of a possible veto, it was tied up in the other body until December 22, 1969, and then finally vetoed almost a month later—in January of this year. This inexcusable delay on the $19,381,000 HEW bill threw a shadow over thousands of schools and health institutions over the Nation for a period of almost 6 months in preparing their budgets, and so forth, all because of implied Presidential veto threats and interferring with our legislative processes. As a final result approximately $229 million was cut from our health, education, and welfare needs for the coming year.

SURVIVAL OF GOVERNMENT

(Mr. DELLENBACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. DELLENBACK. Mr. Speaker, as President Nixon stated in his television address yesterday, the city most affected by the postal strike is the city of New York. Therefore, it is particularly significant that the New York Times has come out in strong support of the President's actions yesterday.

An editorial from this morning's Times recognizes the President's "commendable resolve" in trying to settle this problem, and says that "President Nixon needs and deserves full national support" in the steps he has taken. I include at this point the editorial referred to:

President Nixon needs and deserves full national support in the steps he reluctantly took yesterday to end the illegal postal strike. Every citizen will regret that it has proved necessary to order troops into the New York Post Office, the first time in the country's history that the military has been used to replace striking Federal civil service employes.

That tragic precedent never would have been set if the sound back-to-work advice of the national leaders of the union had been accepted, and the way cleared for immediate negotiations on the very real grievances of the postal employes. The damage done to everyone by the present disastrous confrontation can still be undone by a swift termination of the illegal tie-up.

The factors that made action imperative were clearly set forth in Mr. Nixon's television address. One was the havoc that continued postal paralysis would inflict on every citizen; the other was the necessity for demonstrating that the nation cannot be coerced through the abuse of power by any group—a principle vital to the "survival of government based on law."

None of this negates the justice of the postal workers' basic demand for higher pay nor does it sweep away the culpability of both Administration and Congress for letting the pay issue become a pawn in the frustrating tug-of-war over postal reform. But national attention has now been riveted on the merits of the postmen's case and a mechanism provided for speedily negotiating their demands.

George Meany, president of the A.F.L.–C.I.O., yesterday joined the heads of all the postal unions in urging the postal strikers to resume their duties at once lest they forfeit the public support now so overwhelmingly theirs. Mr. Meany deplores the use of troops in the postal situation, but his chief stress is on the urgency of a return to work to clear the way for redress of all the injustices and inequities the postal employes suffer. The same constructive note was sounded immediately after the Nixon speech by James H. Rademacher, national president of the unionized letter carriers.

The President, for his part, has shown commendable resolve to proceed with restraint in fulfilling his duty to move the mails. He has delayed sending military units into other cities in the hope that the strikers there will end their defiance, thus joining the substantial majority of postal workers who never quit. Even in New York, the sole city in which Federal troops will be employed, soldiers will not be used to deliver the mail. Their primary function will be to sort it under the direction of regular postal supervisors and make it available for pickup at the post office.

It is tragic that troops are needed at all. The right way to get them out—and at the same time to assure equity for the postal workers—is for an orderly resumption of work everywhere. That is the course recommended by the President of the United States and the president of the labor movement. It is the course that will work best for the postal employes and for the country. It is the road away from potential disaster, the road to economic justice for men engaged in a vital national service.

TEXTILE PLANTS CLOSE

(Mr. MANN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, last week one of the largest textile manufacturers in the United States, J. P. Stevens & Co., announced plans to shut down certain of its plants in my district for the period from March 27 to April 6, 1970. As a leader in the textile industry, J. P. Stevens has been in the forefront in wage increases, improved working conditions, minority employment, and technological innovations that provide quality goods at the lowest possible price for the consumer. In making the announcement, a spokesman for the company cited the "continuing imports of synthetic fibers" as a primary cause of the curtailment.

Japan is the largest exporter of textile goods to the United States. I have visited Japan and other Asian nations and seen their textile industries at close range. Goods are produced at wages that would be laughable in this country and under working conditions that are unheard of in America. In addition, Japan maintains strict protectionist policies that insulate its textile industry from foreign imports.

Since last September the U.S. Government has attempted to negotiate with the Japanese with the hope that Japan would voluntarily cut back textile exports. Last week Japan proposed a plan to hold textile imports to 1969 levels in several synthetic and woolen categories. I do not see this plan as a major breakthrough, and I trust that neither this administration nor this Congress will be deluded by this proposal.

Mr. Speaker, I have written to President Nixon regarding the deepening crisis faced by the American textile industry and have called on this administration to support legislation that would impose restrictive quotas on textiles. I have joined with a number of my colleagues in introducing legislation in the 91st Congress, and the time for legislative action is now. Further delays in legislative action will cause irreparable damage to one of America's greatest industries.

Mr. Speaker, recently the morning newspaper in my hometown addressed itself to the textile problem with timely remarks. At this point, I would like to share an article and an editorial which appeared in the Greenville, S.C., News:

MONAGHAN, WATTS, TUXEDO: J. P. STEVENS TO CLOSE THREE PLANTS IN NORTH CAROLINA, SOUTH CAROLINA

J. P. Stevens & Co. Inc., confirmed Tuesday night that it would close two South Carolina plants and one in North Carolina for a week because of "poor business conditions and a need to adjust inventories."

A company spokesman said Monaghan mill here, the Watts plant at Laurens and the Tuxedo plant at Tuxedo, N.C., will be closed for the week, laying off more than 2,000 employes for the week of March 27–April 5.

An earlier report that the big Dunean mill Stevens operates at Greenville would be involved was denied by the company spokesman.

There were no other industry reports of other companies curtailing work at this time.

"We regret that business conditions are such that this curtailment has been necessary, but poor sales and abnormal inventories allow us no other choice.

"We are concerned that any of our people must lose work because of these conditions, one of the primary causes being the continuing imports of synthetic fibers such as these plants produce," the company official said.

The temporary layoffs brought an immediate reaction Tuesday in Washington, where 4th District Rep. James R. Mann reported he had taken the news to Chairman Wilbur Mills (D-Ark.) of the Ways and Means Committee and urged quick passage of pending legislation aimed at curbing textile imports.

"Although the reason given for the layoffs was simply 'business conditions,' I am persuaded that the great increase in cheap textile imports is at the root of the problem," Mann said.

"Mr. Mills was sympathetic and agreed that the situation is at the critical stage. I was very encouraged when he advised me that the committee would begin work on this problem 'very shortly'," Mann said.

Mann also said he was advising President Nixon of the development in this district "with the hope it will speed action by him.

"I feel Congress would give President Nixon any legislation he may need to deal with this critical problem that jeopardizes the economic well-being of so many people in our country," he said.

TIME TO ACT TO SAVE TEXTILES

The one-week loss of work faced by more than 2,000 textile employes in Greenville, Laurens and Tuxedo, N.C., is a severe blow to them and their families and to the economy of this region and the state of South Carolina.

It represents a tragic loss of income for people who can ill afford it, especially as prices continue to rise. It is difficult to calculate the amount of individual hardship which will result from the shutdowns of Monaghan Mill in Greenville, Watts Mill in Laurens and the Tuxedo, N.C., plant during the week of March 27-April 5.

J. P. Stevens and Co., Inc., announcing the temporary closing of the synthetics fibers plants because of poor sales and rising inventories, rightly expressed concern for the people laid off for one week. There is cause for concern and reason to fear that more of the same may be in store in this region.

Although the textile industry long has been suffering general weakness in employment in the form of layoffs, overtime loss, curtailments and closing of some small, marginal plants, the drastic action by a major company brings home the full impact of the foreign imports problem faced by the industry, its workers and the region in which textile plants are concentrated.

The Stevens announcement noted that one of the primary causes for the shutdowns is "the continuing imports of synthetic fibers such as these plants produce."

This action by one of the nation's strongest textile companies ought to remove whatever doubts may have existed about the serious situation imposed on the industry by the unlimited flood of foreign imports into this country. There no longer is any excuse for Japan and other foreign countries to argue that the American textile industry has not been hurt.

At last report Japan continued to refuse any sort of voluntary agreement to limit the flood of Japaneses textiles into the United States. That makes negotiations with other foreign nations impossible.

The time clearly has come for legislation to deal with a situation which threatens to ruin an industry vital to a wide area of the United States. Senators and House members from the textile area now must mount a concerted effort for relief in the form of action by Congress.

The time has come for the President of the United States strongly to advocate passage of relief legislation. President Nixon's administration has tried hard for months to deal with the Japanese. Apparently all efforts to negotiate have failed. As a result Mr. Nixon now must go to Congress in order to redeem the written pledge made to the textile industry and its workers to relieve them of the intolerable burden of unmerciful foreign competition in the domestic market.

The stark fact is that the textile industry cannot endure without serious damage the twin burdens of the domestic economic slowdown and unlimited foreign competition.

The nation cannot afford to let the industry deteriorate, because it is too important to the Southeast and to the effort to help lift minority groups up the economic ladder

Rhetoric and maneuvering around no longer suffice. Concerted action by both the administration and Congress now becomes necessary.

THE NEED FOR A CONFERENCE ON THE POSTAL PAY BILL

(Mr. DULSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, at 11 o'clock this morning I met with Senator McGEE in my office. I asked him to have a conference today. He was in agreement but stated he would have to clear it with his members.

The House conferees have been waiting to meet with the Senate conferees on H.R. 13000. As of this minute we have not heard from the other body.

The House passed H.R. 13000 in one version and the Senate in another. We must have a conference. So we are waiting right now to hear from the Senate conferees.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DULSKI. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VANIK. Can the gentleman give any idea as to whether or not this conference can be had between now and sometime tomorrow? Is there any promise, or any idea?

Mr. DULSKI. We have been in constant contact with the Senator's office. All they told us was that it was heard on the radio that Senator McGEE has agreed to a conference. Since that time we have not heard directly in my committee from the other body.

Mr. VANIK. I must say to the gentleman it is quite a deplorable state of events when the whole country must wait for one person's pleasure in this matter. It seems to me we ought to do something about our parliamentary situation to avoid that kind of problem.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DULSKI. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I should like to congratulate the gentleman in the well, the gentleman from New York (Mr. DULSKI), for the manner in which he has tried to resolve this problem. Not only did he bring H.R. 13000 to the floor last October, and give us an opportunity to vote on the bill, but I know he has been very diligent ever since in trying to get H.R. 13000 resolved and work it out in conference and get it to the President for his signature.

I believe we all owe the gentleman a debt of gratitude for the bill on which he has discharged his responsibility.

I do have a question. I am under the impression that the 5-day cooling off period to which the postal workers across this country—including Chicago, Washington, D.C., and all over the country—have agreed, began to run Monday morning.

It is going to be a breach of faith with those postal workers if we fail to send to the President by Friday, for the President's signature, a pay raise bill.

I have heard many postal workers say they will go back to work and they will resume their duties until Friday.

ADM. "TIP" TISDALE HAULS DOWN HIS FLAG

(Mr. LEGGETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, for more than 50 years the United States has had the benefit of the energy, courage, and patriotic leadership of Vice Adm. Mahlon S. "Tip" Tisdale—over 30 years as an outstanding naval officer and shipyard commandant, and over 20 years liaison between Washington and the communities surrounding Mare Island Naval Shipyard in California.

"Tip" formally retired at the end of last year and I take this time to call to the attention of the House his accomplished public service and announce that, next Tuesday, California will turn out for a suitable testimonial dinner.

No armchair naval officer, "Tip," a graduate of Annapolis, was in the thick of the fray during World War II. He was appointed to the Naval Academy in 1908 and graduated on June 7, 1912.

During World War II, he earned the following decorations: Navy Cross with gold star in lieu of second medal; Distinguished Service Medal for combat; Legion of Merit with gold stars in lieu of second and third award, awarded for duties in combat; Navy Unit Commendation Ribbon; Mexican Service Medal, for duty aboard SS Salem; Victory Medal, World War I for duty aboard SS Birmingham; Liberty Medal, World War I; American Defense Service Medal; American Campaign Medal; Asiatic-Pacific Campaign Medal with six stars; and World War II Victory Medal.

Adm. "Tip" Tisdale held the following commands before becoming commandant of Mare Island: April 1941, commandant of midshipmen of the Naval Academy; June 1942, commander, cruisers, Pacific Task Force 16; and January 1943, commander, destroyers, Pacific Fleet.

He held titles successively as commandant of Mare Island, January 28, 1944, later as commander of San Francisco Naval Base, and later as commander of Mare Island. During this period he not only commanded 40,000 of the best shipbuilders in the country, but managed a comparable private shipbuilding work force on San Francisco Bay.

In 1947, he retired with the rank of vice admiral after a very long and distinguished naval career. Not satisfied to retire, he undertook that year the formal representation of the armed services interests of Solano County in Washington, D.C.

He served with and was adviser to four U.S. Congressmen also representing the area and at least as many U.S. Senators.

At a time when one man, one vote was not the law and Solano County was a fledgling in its development, the strong guidance and support of Admiral Tisdale was critical.

When I came to Washington 8 years ago, I found it a real comfort to be greeted and educated in the Washington scheme by my good friend, "Tip" Tisdale. My predecessor, Congressman John Baldwin, I know found his services invaluable for many years.

Tip's leadership was essential to the development of Solano's many water projects including Monticello. The existing capability at Mare Island and Travis Air Force Base reflect his hard work.

In Washington, his many friends already miss his talents.

THE POSTAL STRIKE

(Mr. GALLAGHER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, we are all, on both sides of the Hill, and certainly throughout the United States, concerned with the postal strike. I have a petition here on the desk that expresses the following viewpoint:

In view of the grave postal crisis which has paralyzed service throughout our country, and in consideration of the justifiable demands of American postal employees, we the undersigned Members of Congress do hereby urge an immediate convening of a conference committee to resolve the questions between the House and Senate versions of H.R. 13000 and proceed with dispatch toward resolving the pay increase of postal employees.

Mr. Speaker, what this petition does in reality is demonstrate confidence in the action that the House has already taken. Both sides have brought forth a bill, H.R. 13000, and the House of Representatives and the undersigned Members renew their confidence in what the committee has done and urge an immediate conference with the Senate so that we can proceed to some meaningful agreement, get the mails going, and start to meet the justifiable demands of the postal employees. I urge all Members to sign this petition.

THE FACTS ABOUT PRAYER IN SCHOOLS

(Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN asked and was given permisison to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, as we are well aware, there has been a great deal of conflict, controversy, and concern in recent years over the question of prayers and scripture reading in our public schools.

Reading through a copy of U.S. News & World Report last week, I ran across an articles written by Louis Cassels and distributed by United Press International, dealing with the legal aspects of prayer in schools.

Because I believe it represents a "breath of fresh air" on this entire question, I am inserting it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with the thought that it may be of interest not only to my colleagues in Congress—but to concerned parents and school authorities everywhere. Certainly, it deserves the attention of all who read the RECORD:

THE FACTS ABOUT PRAYER IN SCHOOLS
(By Louis Cassels)

Few legal opinions have ever been more widely misinterpreted than those handed down by the U.S. Supreme Court concerning prayer and Bible reading in public schools.

Even among school authorities and journalists, who should know better, the idea persists that the Court "banned" prayer and Bible reading from public school classrooms. It did not.

All that it held unconstitutional was the formerly widespread practice of beginning each school day with a miniature worship service, which typically included a devotional reading from the Scriptures and unison recitation of the Lord's Prayer.

This practice, the Court said, infringed religious liberty and transgressed the line of separation between church and state drawn by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

In the Engel v. Vitale case of 1962, the Court held that a public school may not require the recitation of an officially sponsored prayer as part of a classroom religious exercise.

In Abington School District v. Schempp the following year, the Court said that a public school may not require the reading of a portion of the Bible or the recitation of the Lord's Prayer as part of a classroom religious exercise. That is all the Court has forbidden public schools to do.

The Court went out of its way to emphasize that there is no constitutional objection to any of the following activities in public schools:

Use of the Bible as a reference work for teaching secular subjects.

Study of the Bible for its literary and historic qualities.

Objective instruction in comparative religion.

Study of the history of religion and its role in the advancement of civilization.

Reciting historical documents, such as the Declaration of Independence, which contain reference to God.

Singing the National Anthem or patriotic hymns, which include the composers' profession of faith in God.

References to God in patriotic or ceremonial occasions.

Far from "banning" recognition of America's religious heritage, the Court went to unusual lengths to urge that public schools pay more systematic and effective attention to teaching about it.

"It might well be said that one's education is not complete without a study of comparative religion or the history of religion and its relationship to the advancement of civilization," the Court in Abington v. Schempp. "It certainly may be said that the Bible is worthy of study for its literary and historic qualities."

What about "voluntary" prayers in the schoolroom?

If they are the private prayers of an individual, or the group prayers of students meeting on their own time and of their own volition, they are clearly permissible under the terms of the Court rulings.

But if they are part of an official classroom exercise conducted under the aegis of an agent of the Government (the teacher), they would violate the spirit if not the letter of the Court rulings.

Some school districts have inaugurated periods of "silent mediation" in which students are free to pray privately, to think deep thoughts, or just stare out the window, as they see fit. This practice has thus far encountered no objection from federal courts.

Other school districts—a UPI survey last fall indicates the number is substantial and growing—are simply ignoring the Court rulings and going back to the old custom of classroom worship services. This is clearly a defiance of the law as interpreted by the highest court, but a local school may get away with it so long as no parent goes to court to challenge the practice.

Relatively few school districts have had the courage and imagination to teach about religion and the Bible in the objective, constitutional way recommended by the Court. Some school authorities use the Court rulings as an excuse for avoiding what they see as a ticklish and difficult task—a dodge that helps to perpetuate public misunderstanding of the rulings.

Others say that no suitable curriculum materials are available. But this is no longer true. Plenty of good textbooks and course outlines are now on the market.

Any school district or Parent-Teachers Association seriously interested in learning what can be done in public schools—what is being done successfully in some schools—can obtain detailed information from the Religious Instruction Association, Inc., 4001 Fairfield Avenue, Fort Wayne, Ind., 47807.

POSTAL PAY RAISES

(Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the postal workers have made their point. They want higher pay, improved working conditions, and better job opportunities.

The public has long made its demands known. It wants a more efficient mail service, devoid of the burdensome cycle of increasing postal deficits and rising postage rates.

The President, at the very outset of his administration, made his position clear by proposing comprehensive postal reform legislation designed to correct the recognized deficiencies of the Post Office and to provide sensible, proven, and businesslike means of improving the pay, advancement, and working conditions of postal workers.

Now it is up to Congress to act.

We have the means at hand.

While H.R. 4, as rewritten and approved by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee does not speak to the question of needed pay raises for other classified Federal employees, it is a responsible answer to the demands of the public, the needs of the postal workers and the request of the administration in the issue of postal pay and postal reform. The matter of equitable pay for other Federal employees should be considered promptly, of course, or could be included.

H.R. 4 offers postal employees immediate pay hikes and provides them with the right to bargain collectively with management for future raises and other job benefits.

By removing the Post Office from the Cabinet and creating an independent Postal Service Authority, the mails will be freed from irrelevant, restrictive political considerations. This will permit the kind of employee participation, management effectiveness and financial flexibility essential for the successful operation and growth of this vital link in America's social and economic lifeline.

I ask the Congress to join with me in heeding the call of Americans from every walk of life—and from both political parties—for an efficient and economical postal system.

We need this postal pay-postal reform legislation, and we need it now.

I urge its swift approval.

JETS FOR ISRAEL

(Mr. HALPERN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, the decision not to sell Israel 125 additional jets is tragic and shortsighted. It could only serve to further confuse a volatile situation. All Israel asks is to buy these planes; she is not looking for a handout.

For Israel is fighting for her very existence. It is a simple matter of survival. She has been forced to respond to Arab aggression and provocation with effective and persuasive strength. Deterrent force seems to be the only response the Arabs understand.

Therefore, I vigorously disagree with the administration's decision. I do not question the sincerity of its motivation, but I do seriously question the wisdom of it. Although Secretary Rogers emphasized, should Israel's offenses be suddenly threatened, the United States would promptly give Israel whatever jet aircraft it needed, I fear the failure to forthrightly meet Israel's request now seriously poses the question of miscalculation. And further, I feel the latest U.S. move is disappointing because it removes a national Israeli psychological impediment to Arab aggression.

True, the President reiterated that the United States understands and respects its obligation to Israel, but we have been hearing similar assurances from administrations for years. Yet in the showdown, we get repeated asusrances, not actual deeds.

Experience after experience leads us to skepticism that Russia will deescalate its arms shipments as a result of this new policy. It is too much to even anticipate that the Arabs will see this move as a sincere U.S. determination for peace. And it would be pure wishful thinking that Egypt will see the folly of armed atttack. And what are the realities? The first replies to the President's pronouncement have been predictably hostile.

I appeal to the administration to immediately reconsider its decision, and, short of that, I fervently trust that it keeps a constant vigil and be ready to reverse its decision on very, very short notice.

It is vital to point out, Mr. Speaker, that only three countries produce the types of fighter jets Israel needs—Russia, France, and the United States. Israel, in effect, has no choice but to look to its friend, America, since the other two countries are supplying the Arabs.

Here is a State, Israel, our only real friend in that part of the world, defending itself as well as the cause of freedom against Soviet expansionism.

The Soviet shipment of Sam-3 missiles to Egypt; the French sale of 110 Mirage jets to Libya and the arrival of Soviet military units in Egypt to man the new weapons systems—all require a tangible response from our Government.

Our friends must be reassured. Our enemies must not miscalculate. The President must reconsider this interim decision then, so that the Arabs will not interpret it as a softening of U.S. resolve to stand firmly behind Israel.

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF JUDGE CARSWELL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HARRINGTON) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I address myself today to the nomination of Judge Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court of the United States.

I fully understand that it is the senior body, the Senate, which will vote to approve or disapprove this nomination of President Nixon, and I recognize that it is an unusual step to take the floor of this body to urge action by the Senate.

But the issue of Judge Carswell's nomination is of transcending importance.

The implications of Judge Carswell's nomination are too broad to be narrowly viewed as the prerogative only of the President to nominate and the Senate to confirm.

At stake is national policy. At stake is the shape of our society. At stake is the ongoing effort of this country to redress the imbalance in which we have held so many of our black citizens for so long.

This nomination is of national significance. Full appreciation of that fact is now developing across the land, and Members of Congress of both parties and both Houses, as well as citizens throughout the country, must ponder and debate the meaning of the Carswell nomination. Whether we have a vote or not on this nomination is only peripherally important; we all share in the consequences of this nomination.

For that reason, I address the House of Representatives, seeking your attention, your involvement, and your commitment to the defeat of Judge Carswell's nomination.

Mr. Speaker, we must view the Carswell nomination in the context of our times.

Over the past two decades the Supreme Court has played an extraordinary role in shaping American society. That role itself assigns the weight of nomination to the Supreme Court. Beginning with Brown against the Board of Education in 1954, the Supreme Court has rendered benchmark decisions which have given a full dimension to the judicial branch of our Government in architecting governmental response to the needs of our times and to the inequities of the past.

The Supreme Court has, in effect, become the pivotal instrument in the Nation seeking to correct the discrepancy between our stated principles and the facts of life in the United States, a discrepancy which has characterized the treatment of our sizable black minority to a point where despair, frustration, and discontent are justifiably manifest.

That the Congress has been unable to exercise leadership in the field of civil rights is unfortunate, but a fact well known for reasons which are evident.

Now the executive branch under President Nixon is also defaulting in this area. Its efforts to lower its profile in the field of civil rights have virtually destroyed whatever nominal expectations black and white citizens might have had that an equitable society was the goal of the administration.

Only the courts, and especially the Supreme Court, remain sensitive to and responsive to the need for a continued effort to reduce the inequities of American life.

With the Carswell nomination, integrity even in that branch of Government is jeopardized. And quite to the contrary of the expressed intention of the young Nixon administration when the President spoke eloquently of bringing the Nation together, this nomination of a judge whose record shows consistent imbalance, whose scales of justice have been unequally weighted, whose vision of the law has indeed been black and white—this nomination does more to permanently polarize the Nation than any other single act which could be entertained.

Certainly in making these remarks I do not suggest that the President's authority to select nominees to the Supreme Court should be compromised. Neither geographic considerations nor philosophic differences are grounds for criticism. It is in keeping with our tradition that the President should select nominees attuned to his policies. But it is in terms of quality and in terms of fairness to those citizens who come before the bench that Judge Carswell lacks distinction and lacks the stature which would merit his approval.

And this is not a time when the facts of life should be covertly denied. Members of the highest court in the land should be at ease in recognizing the strong obligations of American courts to meet the expectations of our citizens—all of them—that they are entitled to equal justice. Judge Carswell's record does not lead one to that expectation.

At best he is insensitive. But that may not be all.

There is little in his record to suggest that he has the unique capacity for enlightened judgment which should describe our Supreme Court Justices. Rather to the contrary, discussion both before the Senate Judiciary Committee and in the Senate by my distinguished colleagues from Massachusetts, Senator KENNEDY and Senator BROOKE, both indicate that neither in Judge Carswell's private life nor in his capacity as a judge has he demonstrated the caliber of personality nor the wisdom which the Nation has a right to expect of a Supreme Court nominee.

Mr. Speaker, Judge Carswell has been nominated to fill the very seat occupied by Mr. Justice Holmes for more than 30 years and before him occupied by a succession of great New England jurists. Needless to say, I do not claim this seat for my State, but I do claim it for scholarship and wisdom, for judgment and gentleness, for quality and relevance, and for the highest aspirations of the Republic.

I respectfully urge my distinguished colleagues of the Senate to reject the nomination of Judge Carswell.

I repeat that this is a matter of transcending importance, and it is for that reason that I have taken the liberty of discussing a matter which normally is a sole concern of the Senate.

It is for this reason that many concerned Members of the House from different parts of the country—and who are, I think I can say, safely bipartisan in background so far as their political philosophy is concerned—will join today with those of us who have taken special orders to indicate their disapproval of the proposed nomination.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to assure the gentleman that so far as the propriety of the gentleman's discussion is concerned that on a number of occasions during the 5 years that I have served in the House of Representatives, many Members of this body have taken the floor to comment upon the activities of Members of the U.S. Supreme Court. So, the gentleman's action today, and of others who will speak today, certainly is not unprecedented.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentleman for entering into this discussion and for making what obviously is a very dispassionate and enlightened contribution to the national knowledge concerning this very vital problem.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana: Does he agree with me in general that there is a legitimate reason for concern that the strides made in the area of improving the racial problems that beset our country and in general in the recognition of these problems through these distinguished bipartisan commissions on national disaster would best be served by the Senate rejection of Justice Carswell in view of the polarization which is spoken of so often and rhetorically dealt with?

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with the gentleman and I concur in his judgment completely.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KOCH. Mr. Speaker, I want to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks in every way. I think those people who have said the President is entitled to make his own choice in this matter have approached this in a rather simplistic way. Indeed, he does have the right to submit names to the Senate for its advice and consent that is the nature of the constitutional requirement. There is the requirement that the Senate consent to the nomination so the President does not have an absolute right in this area. Therefore, it becomes very important that the background of the man whose name has been submitted be the subject of great review. I am very pleased that the Senate is taking the time to do this.

What we are seeing, as a result of the review now taking place, is that the man whose name has been submitted for confirmation can at best be described as mediocre.

I know that one Senator has said that what the Court needs is a "mediocre" lawyer to give it balance. It is an insult to the people of this country that any Senator should suggest that they deserve no better. And I think that even his own constituents will find the Senator's comment very offensive.

But irrespective of the judgment of that gentleman from the other body, I do believe that the Supreme Court ought to have sitting on it a man of the highest integrity and caliber, a man whose brilliance shines like a jewel. Because after all, it is the Supreme Court which is the arbiter of what the law finally is. It is those Justices who are going to make the decision as to whether or not this body, the other body, and the Chief Executive are in fact complying with all constitutional requirements. I think it is of the utmost importance that we inquire into the philosophy and ethics of the gentleman whose name has been submitted to the Senate for its approval.

We recognize the fact that there are those who say, "Well, there have been people"—and they point to a distinguished sitting Justice of the Supreme Court as their example—"who have in their background some history of racial intolerance and yet gone on to establish their freedom from such bigotry." We know that Mr. Justice Black has served with great distinction and his judicial decisions have been exemplary in every field, including those dealing with racial problems.

The difference between Justice Black and Judge Carswell is that there was a real change in philosophy by Justice Black prior to his nomination to the Court. Unfortunately, there has not been any evidence, adduced in the Senate hearings, showing that Judge Carswell has changed his point of view, especially in light of the remarks and recent decisions he has made on the subject of racial equality.

I can readily understand when someone, by virtue of where he was born or the family he was brought up in, acquires biases; for, after all, we are greatly affected by such upbringing, and we carry those prejudices with us. Few, if any, are free of prejudice. But the real question is, Are you able to overcome it? It is possible by experience and dispassion to overcome emotions of prejudice which might otherwise govern one's outlook on race.

In the case of Judge Carswell, he has not demonstrated that dispassion. When we look at his credentials we must examine his philosophy and approach to racial equality. How does he stand? After all, what is the major problem facing this country? It is racial intolerance. Has he demonstrated that he is fit to sit on that bench and decide cases, so many of which will involve racial discrimination? I say he has not.

On another aspect, I must say that as an attorney, I believe we are entitled to someone whom attorneys and jurists can look to with pride and say, "We come before this man knowing he has the mind, the ability, and the judicial temperament to sit in judgment." Judge Carswell certainly does not have those attributes. If you just look at the records on appeal of his many decisions, you will find he has been reversed so many times it gives a lawyer pause to think that someone so lacking in judicial excellence might sit on the bench reviewing or deciding the most important cases in this country.

For those reasons I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I think the nominee, Judge Harrold Carswell, ought not be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KOCH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman from New York (Mr. KOCH) referred to someone unnamed, an unidentified Member of the other body, as having commented on the Carswell nomination. I wonder if this could by any chance be one of those Members of the other body who has owned and lived on property in Maryland, while a Member of the other body, which was subject to a racial covenant relating to the buying and selling of that property. Would that be possible?

Mr. KOCH. I have no idea as to who is being inquired about by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I have no idea of the background of the gentleman that the gentleman from New York was referring to either. I was trying to find out if they were practicing hypocrisy. I cannot believe that a Member of the other body would be hypocritical in their opposition to Carswell.

Mr. KOCH. If I understand the gentleman correctly, you are now inquiring about a Member of the other body who is attacking the credentials of Judge Carswell. Is that your question? I gather it is, and I must say to the gentleman I am not here to sit in judgment on Members of the other body. Those Senators are not being nominated for the Supreme Court. I am here stating my opinion with respect to a gentleman whose name has been submitted by the President for office in the Highest Court of this land. It is his credentials that are subject to scrutiny, not those of some Member of the Senate.

Mr. GROSS. The gentleman referred to a Member of the other body who, he said, had made some comment——

Mr. KOCH. To his own constituency and the country.

Mr. GROSS. In criticism of Mr. Carswell.

Mr. KOCH. I had reference to a gentleman in the other body who has referred to the need for including mediocrity on the Supreme Court bench. I have a much higher regard for the intellectual desires of the country and I believe that it is the responsibility of the President and the Senate to provide the Nation with Justices of the highest caliber and not try to achieve mediocrity.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I thank the gentleman from New York. I can only concur in what he has said about the agreement which I believe is universal among those of us here this afternoon that the President should and does have the right to submit nominees of his own persuasion.

What we are interested in doing this afternoon is to demonstrate our concern that the nominee before the Senate today for confirmation is not a nominee who meets those very high standards and high tests which should characterize nomination to the High Court.

I believe the purpose here in our dialog is to attempt to broaden the awareness on the part of the public that this appointment could dramatically alter—over the course of the next generation—many of the benchmark decisions since the middle 1950's.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSS. Was the gentleman a member of the Massachusetts Legislature?

Mr. HARRINGTON. Yes, I was.

Mr. GROSS. Did not the Massachusetts Legislature send down an endorsement—or at least some portion of the Massachusetts Legislature—send down an endorsement of a nominee by the name of Mr. Morrissey?

Mr. HARRINGTON. The Massachusetts Legislature, I believe, in 1965 by a resolution endorsed the nomination of Justice Morrissey to the Court. There were many abstentions and many voted "present." There were two voting "nay," and I was one of those voting "nay" at that time as a member of that body.

Mr. GROSS. I appreciate the gentleman's response and commend him for having voted "nay."

Mr. HARRINGTON. Thank you.

I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I want to join in the commendations of those who have expressed their appreciation for the gentleman from Massachusetts taking this time to begin this inquiry, which I think is a very appropriate matter for the House.

I, myself, have testified before the Senate on this matter and I have joined in with the gentleman and others in a special order of my own to follow directly afterward.

I think that we are now in the process of noting—and I doubt if it can be denied by anyone—that there is increasing opposition to the nomination of Judge Carswell both inside and outside of the U.S. Senate. As a matter of fact, this began some several months ago and was considered to be a very futile attempt to block a nomination, since it is so rare, historically, for two Presidential nominations to be turned down one after another. There, thus, was a great deal of skepticism expressed as to whether or not there would be the ability on the part of those who felt that Mr. Carswell should not be confirmed to mount that kind of effort. Now we find that there are a great many Senators who have announced only very recently that they will not confirm. I was advised only this afternoon that both Senators from Missouri, for example, have announced their intention not to vote for confirmation of Mr. Carswell. Others are no doubt going through some agonizing reappraisals of their original positions, and it seems to me that the gentleman in the well and the discussion of others here today on the floor of the House is certainly contributory toward those Members in the Senate who are interested in the views of the Members of the House here who are their colleagues. They are also certainly interested in the expressions that we bring not only from the legal ranks and the ranks of lawyers and judges but from the American people as well.

Mr. Speaker, I might take this opportunity to note that it is certainly a bipartisan effort, as the gentleman indicated. There are aspects of this nomination that certainly go far beyond any considerations of partisanship. As a matter of fact, I think one of the things that has been characteristic about the objections that have been presented against Mr. Carswell is the fact that they have cut across party lines; they know no regional distinctions; they are not relegated to any particular class or segment of the American public. So I think this discussion here further underlines the feeling which, in my judgment, must surely be that of a great number of Americans. I have no polls to show you that this is the position of the majority of Americans, but it is certainly clear that there have been very few nominations that have resulted in the widespread reaction against a nominee which has been engendered in the nomination of Mr. Carswell.

And so after hearing the statements of the Members who have joined with the gentleman in the well and the gentleman's own very excellent initial statement I am very indebted to the gentleman for the excellent presentation that he has made.

I want to note here that these are not emotional kinds of statements that have been made on the floor today. I think they are tempered, they are well reasoned, they are sound and they are fair not only to the administration and the President but to the appointee himself. I think that these evaluations and assessments have been outstanding for their lack of bias or vindictiveness that might easily have become attached to a matter of this nature.

Again I thank the gentleman. I hope that other Members will see fit under the leave to extend that the gentleman has secured today, to take the opportunity to indicate their position on the nomination of Judge Carswell.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am not sure that anything that is said here will have very much effect on the other body. But it seems to me that the defense that was made of Judge Carswell that he might be a mediocre man and that there are a lot of mediocre people that need representation is about as stupid a statement as I have heard in the 21 years that I have been down here.

I have received some telegrams from my district asking me to vote against Judge Carswell. Of course there are a lot of people in this country who do not realize that the House of Representatives does not pass on these appointments. But I have no hesitancy in saying that I would vote against Judge Carswell if I were in the other body mainly because of his mediocrity because I just think he is extremely mediocre and he does not have very much ability. And in these days we need people with a great deal of ability to serve on the Supreme Court.

I have no objection to the President appointing a southerner. As a matter of fact he did not ask me for any recommendations, but had he done so I might have suggested our former colleague from South Carolina, Bob Hemphill, who was an exceedingly useful Member of this body in my opinion and who was not I would say a knee-jerk conservative and who was not a knee-jerk liberal. He voted on the issues as he saw them in the light of his understanding and I suspect also in the light of the section from which he came. But I found him to be very broadminded and I thought with a great deal of temperament to make a good judge and a fair and honest one. He had a sense of humor, and of all things that it seems to me one needs.

So the field is wide open as far as getting a southerner to serve on the Court. You do not need to look for the one that has the least ability. I am not saying the President did this, but it seems to me that if he had set out to find one with the very least ability he could not have made a better selection than he did.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want the moment to pass without observing how pleased I am to find myself on the same side of a question as my friend, the gentleman from Ohio. It is something I was sure would happen sooner or later, but who could have guessed Judge Carswell would produce it.

I appreciate his suggestion that the most effective defense of the appointment of Judge Carswell might not be to tout his mediocrity, but that raises the problem of what would be the most effective defense, if for some reason one were obliged to defend it.

I also agree with the gentleman from Ohio that very competent and able people are available in the South for appointments of such eminence and importance. We could compile a very distinguished list of southern jurists and lawyers who, whatever their viewpoint on specific legal or political questions, have accepted the law of the land on the question of race, and who have lived as equals, happily, with their neighbors of all races, men who would add to the prestige and effectiveness of the court immeasurably.

As I suggested earlier today, it is a great error to defend the appointment of a man who is not qualified by claiming you are eager to bring "balance" to the court. I think it is that confusion that led to Senator HRUSKA's contribution to the discussion.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAYS. I hope that the gentleman from New York in saying that he is joined with me is not trying to hurt me in my primary campaign. I trust his motives are of the best. He and I do not always find ourselves on the same side of every issue. But since one of the newspapers the other day said that I am unpredictable, I guess my constituents would find me on whatever side of an issue I really believe in.

I think I can defend myself, if I am attacked because I am on the same side as the gentleman on this particular issue.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I will make a deal with the gentleman—I will not campaign for him if he will not campaign for me. But I thought I had been told that he is not opposed in the primary or in the election.

Then I was misinformed. But I am still delighted to join the gentleman in showing what diversified points of view agree that the appointment of Judge Carswell should be rejected.

For once the President really has brought us together. That may be the most hopeful result of the whole Carswell affair.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join my colleagues and the gentleman in the well in bringing this matter before the House today.

I believe that while we cannot have any particular impact or perhaps influence on the final outcome because it is not within our purview, perhaps it is wise to point out that so many Americans still look upon the Supreme Court as an adjunct of government rather than as a coequal branch of Government.

I think many Americans overlook the fact that this great Republic is governed by three separate and coequal branches. We, in the legislative, the President in the executive, and the Supreme Court in the judicial branch.

When one reflects that the Supreme Court has nine men who within their power and the Constitution have as great an impact, if not greater, on the affairs of this Nation as do both the executive branch and the legislative branch, you then—and only then—capture the scope of the importance and the enormity of the decision in appointing a Supreme Court Justice.

For here indeed are nine men who can by a split decision or by a unanimous decision alter the very course of the history of this country.

When you view the Supreme Court in perspective, of being a coequal branch of government having coequal rights to the executive and to the legislative, you then are struck with the reality that the members of that body ought to be men of exceptional and outstanding and even extraordinary ability.

It would appear that the President of the United States would seek as appointees to that body an individual of such extraordinary ability and talent that there would be no question and that he would be sustained and the appointment would be approved by the Senate of the United States unanimously.

The bitter debate that is now going on in the other body where perhaps at this point in time that body is almost evenly divided as to whether or not Justice Carswell should be appointed to the Supreme Court will reflect upon the validity of the decision of that Court for generations to come. For, indeed, that appointment is a lifetime appointment and long after many of us in this Chamber are gone and long after many Senators are gone, Judge Carswell may still be on that bench.

I am not at all impressed by the statement made by one of his supporters that whatever deficiencies he may have now, he will grow on the job. What a mockery of our Constitution to suggest that the Supreme Court of the United States, a coequal branch of the Government, is going to provide on-the-job training for Supreme Court Judges. So it does not make much difference as to whether or not he is an integrationist or a racist, or whether he is a liberal or whether he is a conservative, or whether he is for this or for that. It seems to me the other Chamber has the responsibilty of saying this particular candidate fits into the mold of having such extraordinary qualifications that there cannot be any doubt in the minds of 100 Senators or 200 million Americans whether he deserves to be on that bench. That is the test, in my judgment, and it seems to me on the basis of the debate we have seen unfolding before this country in the last couple of weeks and the debate now going on in the other body, one cannot help but conclude that, regardless of what his political views may be, he just does not have the qualifications in terms of stature, judgment, and experience to become one of nine men—nine men—in whose hands lies the equal power of the future of this Republic. That is what I think it all boils down to.

I congratulate my colleague for taking the time today to give the Members of the House an opportunity to express themselves.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONYERS. Of course, we frequently end up on the same side, so I am happy to see us in agreement, and I hope the gentleman's very powerful statement will have an impact on some citizens, who in turn may have an impact upon some U.S. Senators, who in turn may cast the deciding vote that will determine the outcome of a question that is certainly of as great importance as the gentleman suggests.

However, the gentleman pointed out that it made no difference to him whether Mr. Carswell was an integrationist or a segregationist, and on that point I perhaps feel constrained to add a comment or two. Perhaps it does make a difference whether a person moving toward the highest judicial court in this country is a segregationist or not. I feel that perhaps that is one of the great pressing issues that concerns a great number of people in this land, that is, whether or not G. Harrold Carswell is presently a segregationist.

It is my view, having tried to dispassionately review his record, that unfortunately his background, his segregationist and racist statements and activities, lead me to no other conclusion—and I think many fair people have reached the same opinion—that his background is of such a segregationist nature that it would be impossible on those grounds alone, assuming that there were questions of qualification, for us to ask those distinguished Members of the other body to affirmatively pass upon his nomination.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PUCINSKI. I am grateful to my colleague from Michigan for calling that particular expression to my attention. Surely it does make a difference. It makes a difference to all of us. I wanted to say—and if the record is not clear, I want to make it clear now—that I would not be prone necessarily to give a candidate for the Supreme Court some sort of political test. I would hope that we could find qualified citizens in this country who would be men or women of such stature, such outstanding ability, and such outstanding objectivity that the questions whether or not a nominee is a segregationist or an integrationist would never even enter the discussion.

What we want is someone who is capable of sitting on that bench as one of nine important members who share in that particular branch of Government the coequal rights of the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States. That is the point I was trying to make. I appreciate my colleague's calling the matter to my attention.

Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DEVINE. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for yielding.

Up until only a moment ago it was my understanding that the advice and consent of the other body was what was necessary in approving Justices for the U.S. Supreme Court. I came into this Chamber from a committee meeting upstairs, and I find some of my colleagues here deploring the nomination of Judge Carswell as a proposed Justice for the U.S. Supreme Court.

It seems to me we have lost sight of the function of these two bodies, the House and the Senate. The gentleman from Illinois has become an expert on all subjects. He is up every day on something or other, and he is up again on this particular one. It seems to me we are not now functioning as the United States. If a man comes from the South, he cannot be considered as coming from the United States, and he has to be approved by the National Association of Colored People and George Meany. If he is otherwise, he is just not acceptable.

It seems to me we have to have a balanced Supreme Court. As long as the gentlemen on the other side think it is up to them to advise and consent to the nomination made by the President, it does seem to me that Judge Carswell is entitled and is qualified to sit on the Supreme Court, particularly with some of those now on the Court.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I want to bring to the attention of the House, and hopefully the country, a number of facts that have been obscured by much of the oratory on the appointment of Judge Carswell to the Supreme Court.

First, I want to insert in the RECORD a telegram from Neal P. Rutledge, a well-known Florida attorney who is the son of former Supreme Court Justice Wiley Rutledge. I put this in the RECORD because it relates to the important issue of Judge Carswell's record on race relations. Mr. Rutledge writes:

MIAMI, FLA.

During late 1955 and early 1956 I lived a great part of the time in Tallahassee, Florida, in connection with the trial of Seaboard Machinery Corp. vs. Bethlehem Steel Co. in the U.S. District Court there. It was common knowledge in the community there at that time, and especially among members of the Bar, that the dominant motive for transferring the operation of the Tallahassee Golf Club from public to private club auspices was to prevent racial integration of the facilities. The overwhelming sentiment of the white Tallahassee community at that time was to preserve Jim Crow racial segregation as a way of life, particularly in hotels, restaurants, places of social gatherings, and the like. It is impossible for me to believe that any prominent member of the Tallahassee community at that time, such as then United States Attorney Carswell, was not fully aware of both this general, almost universal sentiment prevailing among the white citizens of Tallahassee in 1956 and the specific dominant motive for leasing the Municipal Golf Club to a private group.

Sincerely,

NEAL P. RUTLEDGE.

We thus have the testimony of a distinguished Florida attorney and son of a former Supreme Court Justice that as late as 1956—not 20-odd years ago—this gentleman who is seeking a place on the Supreme Court was involved in an effort to prevent racial desegregation of a golf club.

I also want to record the fact that two other prominent attorneys from Judge Carswell's home State—William R. Colson, immediate past president of the American Association of Trial Lawyers, and Allen Milledge, president of the Harvard Law School alumni in Florida—have authorized me to announce their opposition to the confirmation of Judge Carswell. I have also received a report that three-fourths of the members of the Florida State University Law School have announced their opposition to his confirmation.

Mr. Speaker, I mention these things specifically to show that this is not a matter of regional opposition to the appointment of a southern judge. Indeed, what we are challenging, among other things, is the notion that Judge Carswell is representative of southern legal talent.

The South—black and white—has furnished more than its share of the country's great political and legal figures, a proud company that includes some of the wisest and fairest Justices who have ever sat on the Supreme Court. As the debate over the Carswell appointment goes on, more and more outstanding southern members of the legal profession are making it clear that they do not share the President's notion that Judge Carswell is a fitting representative of the southern bar, deserving as such a seat on the Supreme Court.

These distinguished lawyers from Judge Carswell's own State are not opposing him because he is a southerner or a conservative, but because of his record on the racial question and the quality of his work in the course of his public career.

I would like to stress that I think conservatives do themselves an injustice when they imply that there is some connection between the views they hold—respectable and proper views on many important questions—and the views of Judge Carswell that are in question. It is not Judge Carswell the conservative but Judge Carswell the segregationist, the supporter of white rule, that we question. I am sure that most conservatives in the United States would reject these views. I cannot believe they would want someone filling a seat on the Supreme Court who has been unwilling to accept the equality of the races as basic to the law of this country and to the way we live together as a free people. That is the Carswell question, insofar as his views are the question at all.

What is at issue, of course, is not whether Judge Carswell is a conservative or a "strict constructionist," or a southerner. The problem with Judge Carswell has to do with his qualifications and with the deeply troubled state of the Nation, a situation in which we need to work to regain respect for the law. In times like these, can it seriously be contended that we should put someone on the court who does not have the respect of a large number of our black citizens because of his behavior during his long public career, on and off the bench.

As far as his record as a jurist is concerned, I want to put in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Post entitled "Judge Carswell: A Look at the Reversal Record." I recommend that it be studied very carefully.

I might add an observation about the problem now facing Senator GURNEY, who relied on inaccurate research in his defense of Judge Carswell the other day.

As Members may know, Senator GURNEY had taken the position that Judge Carswell's record of reversal by higher courts was really rather exceptional instead of rather dismal, as charged by critics. I hope he will have an opportunity to study the Post editorial, which contains a very careful compilation of that record, and I hope he will then realize that his defense of Judge Carswell was based on flimsy and misleading research. Perhaps this realization will even lead Senator GURNEY to join the opposition to Judge Carswell's appointment.

JUDGE CARSWELL: A LOOK AT THE REVERSAL RECORD

There has been a lot of talk in the Senate in recent days about Judge Carswell's 11 years of service as a federal trial judge and how well that fits him or does not fit him for service on the Supreme Court. Those opposed to his confirmation point to the rate at which his decisions have been reversed as a demonstration that he is, at best, a run-of-the-mill judge. Those who support confirmation claim that the reversal rate presents a "distorted and unreal" picture. "Like so many of the charges against him (this one) dissolves when exposed to the light of day," Senator Gurney said the other day, claiming that the judge has been reversed in only 33 out of the more than 2,000 civil cases he has handled and in only eight out of more than 2,500 criminal cases.

These figures are totally irrelevant, not to say blatant distortions.

The numbers of 2,000 and 2,500 represent all the cases filed in Judge Carswell's court and only about 15 per cent of these ever went to trial. What matters is what the Court of Appeals thought of the far smaller number of decisions it actually had an opportunity to review. There are fewer than 200 of these, according to the reports of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, but no one has produced a list of all of them. Compiling such a list is difficult since the cases are spread over tens of volumes of law books. But we have looked at all those we could find in the reports of the Fifth Circuit since July 1, 1964 and report the following concerning the record of the last half of his trial judge experience:

In criminal cases, Judge Carswell was upheld in 21 of 25 decisions, an affirmance rate of 84 per cent. All the other judges in his circuit were upheld 81 per cent of the time during the last five fiscal years.

In civil cases, Judge Carswell was upheld in 18 of 53 cases, an affirmance rate of 34 per cent. All the other trial judges in his circuit were upheld 72 per cent of the time.

In habeas corpus and similar cases, included in the civil category above because the courts list them that way, Judge Carswell was upheld in 5 out of 15 decisions, an affirmance rate of 33 per cent. All the other judges in Florida were upheld in 67 per cent of these cases during this period.

In the other civil cases—the disputes over contracts, accidents, and so on that are the bread and butter of the federal courts—Judge Carswell was upheld in 13 of 39 cases, a rate of 33 per cent. The other judges in the South have a batting average in such cases of about 75 per cent.

The key that may explain this record seems to lie in the reputation Judge Carswell has among some lawyers of not wanting to try cases. Each habeas corpus reversal came because he denied a petition without a hearing. More than half of all the other reversals in civil cases came because he granted pre-trial motions to dismiss, or for summary judgment, in situations which the Court of Appeals said required trials. It seems remarkable, for instance, that he was reversed several times over several years in negligence cases involving such things as auto accidents, a swimming pool accident, and a boat collision. These are cases in which the facts almost always determine the outcome and the law is clear that disputed facts cannot be resolved in summary judgments.

Judge Carswell's inclination to dispose of cases summarily does help clear court dockets when he is right. But it also helps clog them when he is wrong. And it seems that those who believe a jury ought to decide the facts must pay the costs of an appeal to win a reversal and a trial. The desire of a judge to be bold and to dispose of cases without trial might be understandable if he presided over an extremely busy docket. However, the caseload in Judge Carswell's court was regularly below the average per judge in his circuit and after 1962 was the lowest per judge in that circuit.

This record is not what could be called a good one. It is not, we suspect, even mediocre, as Senator Hruska would say. Nor can it be explained away, as some of the judge's supporters would have us believe, by arguments about the cases that were not appealed, about laws or court interpretations that had been changed in midstream, or about partial reversals. Among the 35 reversals in civil cases, three were partial, and no more than half a dozen came because of intervening court decisions and new issues of law. The others were decisions by the Court of Appeals that Judge Carswell was simply wrong—wrong 12 times because he ruled without hearing the facts. What all this means, it seems to us, is that the claim that Judge Carswell has been "an outstanding federal judge," to use Senator Gurney's words, evaporates when it is exposed to careful scrutinity.

Mr. Speaker, I suppose the best excuse for the Carswell appointment was provided by Senator HRUSKA when he said that mediocrity should be given its due, even on the highest court in the land. No doubt this seemed a sensible approach for Senator HRUSKA to have taken since it avoids the difficulty of denying facts that are difficult to deny, and even seeks to make virtues of them.

Senator GURNEY's awkward situation shows what happens if instead you attempt to deny what is plainly true.

If we are indeed looking for a judge of mediocre mind and backward outlook, clearly the Carswell appointment is a triumph. One should look no further.

We are all indebted to the gentleman from Massachusetts for beginning this discussion in a spirit that can only contribute to an intelligent appraisal of the issues.

I thank the gentleman for the opportunity to enter some of my thoughts at this time. I will join the discussion again later.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from the President's inaugural address in which he said:

No man can be fully free while his neighbor is not. To go forward at all is to go forward together.

This means black and white together, as one Nation, not two. The laws have caught up with our conscience. What remains is to give life to what is in the law; to ensure at last that as all are born equal in dignity before God, all are born equal in dignity before man.

On November 6, 1968, the President said:

I saw many signs in this campaign. The one that touched me the most was one that I saw in Desher, Ohio, at the end of a long day of whistle stopping. A little town. I suppose five times the population was there. In the dusk it was almost impossible to see, but a teenager held up a sign, "Bring us together." And that will be the great objective of this Administration.

Mr. Speaker, the term "segregation" does not mean "bring us together."

In my judgment, nominations, particularly in this case, speak much louder than words.

I would hope that if the American people are fortunate enough to follow the tradition of statesmanship in this country—the tradition of Washington, Franklin, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, Jay, and indeed Abraham Lincoln and all the others—and if the people of this Nation should be fortunate enough in the coming weeks to have one more opportunity to follow that great tradition and reject the suggestion that mediocrity should be represented at the highest councils of our country, the President might well follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio a few moments ago.

If the President feels that it is proper—and it is quite proper for the President to feel that—to nominate a jurist from the southern part of our country, believing as I do that it is one country, perhaps he will look further into the qualifications, and think of the qualifications, for example, of a gentleman who is a Member of this body, and probably constitutionally ineligible for such an appointment because of his membership in this body at this time, the Honorable RICHARD POFF of Virginia, who is indeed a conservative, who is indeed a southerner, but who also indeed is a human being of high quality, of objectivity, of impeccable intellectual honesty, and who above all is a gentleman who believes in human rights.

I am sure in making such a nomination the President and the Government should appeal to the best in Americans, not the worst in Americans.

I do not believe any Member of this body is unmindful of the fact that in the past 3 or 4 or 5 years there has been a faltering and a retreat from the ideals that all of us in our Sunday oratory or in our inaugural speeches—those of us given the privilege to make them—would pay tribute to. There has been a retreat from that kind of idealism.

There has been a retreat among blacks in the face of segregationist statements made by certain blacks in this country. There has been a hesitancy among certain blacks to speak up and say, "We still believe we are one. There is a dream of one America."

There is a hesitancy among whites also to speak up and say, "There is still more good and more idealism in America than much of the officialdom of America is presuming at this time."

Mr. LANDGREBE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDGREBE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, it is Holy Week. We have had some good advice coming down through the ages, such as "Judge not, and ye shall not be judged" and also something about speaking well of people, of our fellowmen.

Now, there are times when we Members of this House of Representatives have to make decisions; we have to choose; we have to judge. However, this does not happen to be one of those instances. We are here engaged in destroying a man whom we have no direct obligation to judge or destroy or to build up. The confirmation of Mr. Carswell is the business of the Senate.

There has been a good bit said here about Mr. Carswell. I have not met this gentleman, I am sorry to say, but this man has risen above mediocrity to the point of having been nominated for a seat on the U.S. Supreme Court by a great President of these United States. I think this in itself speaks in some manner to the fact that this man has risen above mediocrity.

I really do not know exactly what is intended when this word is used here repetitiously today. However, I say "Judge not and be not judged." Perhaps those of us sitting in this body at this very moment had better take a look at ourselves, at our own qualifications for membership in this great body.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANDGREBE. Yes. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I am curious. I respect your view about the importance of not destroying a man's character. I do not think anything I have said today would destroy anyone's character. I think it is important not to pass judgment on the personal qualifications and qualities of human beings, especially those we do not know personally. However, is it not a part of our obligation when a man is nominated to the Supreme Court of the United States to consider his public record?

I have heard many Members of this House attack Supreme Court Justices even on the basis of their private lives and personal records. In the present situation we are limiting our criticism to the public record of a man who has been proposed for membership on the Supreme Court. Is it not part of our responsibility as elected officials to do whatever we can to add to the respect of the public for its highest governmental institutions, including the Supreme Court? That means that every American should be able to feel that, regardless of color or creed, he can be sure that the law will be applied fairly at the highest level, if not always before that. I think Judge Carswell's record must be weighed in view of that consideration.

So far as the mention of mediocrity in connection with the appointment of Judge Carswell, the problem is not his alleged "mediocrity" was raised in his defense by a distinguished Senator, who said that the Carswell nomination should be supported as a way to give the mediocre a voice on the Court. In view of that assertion—since repeated by other supporters of the nomination in slightly different words, it has become very hard to discuss the appointment without discussing that defense of it.

Mr. LANDGREBE. As long as the gentleman in the well and others who are privileged to speak here wish to talk about merit and a man's record objectively, I certainly would not object to that. However, we have gotten ourselves into a cycle here where we are talking about mediocrity. I would not consider the comments I have heard to be used in a complimentary light but, rather, in a derogatory light.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I would only like to observe that I have repeatedly heard in this House comments on the qualifications of sitting judges of the Supreme Court. I find it hard to believe that it is proper to comment on sitting Justices but not on one not yet seated. It seems clear that it is quite important to have qualified comments on proposed nominees for the Court. That is what witnesses are for at the Senate hearings. That is why I have reserved the views of various distinguished Florida lawyers. As our very able colleague from Michigan has said, some of these men will be sitting on the bench long after many of us are no longer sitting here.

There is another matter that keeps recurring in this discussion, and that is the racial question. I wonder how many members who defend this appointment would support a black nominee to the Supreme Court who in the course of his public career had shown by word and deed that he believed the black race was superior to the white, who had participated in drawing up agreements to bar white people from clubs that are supposed to be open to the public, and who had displayed a vigorous hostility in his courtroom to lawyers protesting illegal discrimination against white people. Would anyone argue that such a man should be confirmed? If Thurgood Marshall's career had demonstrated a bias against white people, can anyone believe he would be on the Court today? That the answers to these questions are self-evident speaks volumes on the double standard that still obtrudes in situations like this in this country.

Mr. LANDGREBE. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield for a further moment?

Mr. HARRINGTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LANDGREBE. Mr. Speaker, it has become quite popular in the last few years to consider liberals and conservatives and there has been a good bit of talk about Mr. Carswell and his rather conservative views. It seems to me, having just seen the charts on this floor recently of the rapid and unbelievably fast rise in major crimes across the country, much of it attributed to decisions of the Supreme Court, that it is perhaps conceivable to assume that a black man would be happy and would be much better off to have a conservative on the Court because the black man is the victim of major crimes the same as the white man. And I am not sure that all that is being said and being indicated or suggested here is necessarily true in that Mr. Carswell is necessarily a mediocre man or that he would pull down the Court but could conceivably in my book bring the Court back to a level of integrity and reason that is lacking today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, in a scant 6 years the country will celebrate the second century of its existence as an independent Nation. Throughout most of this period the Nation has been guided by its founding document—the Constitution of the United States.

This fundamental and almost sacred document has served the Nation through periods of rapid and unprecedented economic development, enormous social change, a Civil War, and the atomic age. Yet it remains today virtually unchanged from the document originally adopted.

This remarkable longevity has been accomplished in large measure due to the ability of the Supreme Court to interpret the document in a flexible and intelligent manner. Through interpretation, the Constitution has been adapted to circumstances which differ greatly from those which faced its authors.

Obviously, this could not have been accomplished without the wisdom and intelligence of those men who have served as Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States and who, in their small number, represent the third and coequal branch of Government. Had these men been mediocre—had they been men of little foresight or knowledge—the Constitution could not have survived. Indeed, it will not survive if the men who interpret it are not representative of the best legal talents this country possesses.

Judge G. Harrold Carswell's record has been undistinguished to say the least. His opinions have been reversed frequently by higher courts. Moreover, many lawyers and law teachers have questioned his competence—indeed, the dean of one of our most prestigious law schools has indicated that Judge Carswell's record is one of the least distinguished of any Supreme Court nominee in this century. Finally, the American Bar Association's committee on the Federal judiciary found that Judge Carswell was merely "qualified" for the position—a finding that could be reached of any lawyer who is not currently the subject of disciplinary proceedings. In short, by the most charitable of standards, he appears to be a man of mediocre talent.

Mr. Speaker, the President does a great disservice to the country when consciously or unconsciously he demeans the Court by nominating to membership a man who is not equal to the task—a man who even his supporters admit is a man of mediocre legal talent.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the Members of the other body to exercise their constitutional responsibility in a manner which will preserve the integrity of our highest court. Mr. Speaker, I urge them to reject the nomination of Judge Carswell.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous material on the subject of my special order today, the qualifications of Judge Carswell.

THE SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON RULES TO FILE CERTAIN PRIVILEGED REPORTS

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what was the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Michigan repeat his unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Rules may have until midnight tonight to file certain privileged reports.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, and I hope I will not have to object, this is rather unusual that there should be a request to transact business of the House after special orders have started. This comes at a most unusual time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the Chair is of the opinion that this request has been previously cleared with the minority leadership and that there was an accord that this unanimous-consent request be granted.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the minority has cleared the request, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

THE QUALIFICATIONS OF JUDGE CARSWELL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to conclude the discussion I was having with the distinguished gentleman from Indiana on the other side of the aisle.

The gentleman raises a very valid point, which is that we do not want to exclude the conservative point of view from the Supreme Court. But, as I tried to point out earlier, it is not Judge Carswell's conservatism that is at issue.

My objection to Mr. Carswell has nothing to do with his being a conservative or a southerner. I have spent a great deal of my life in the South and many of my friends and associates, in the legal profession and elsewhere, are conservative in their legal, socioeconomic and philosophical outlooks. I will be glad to supply a list of conservative lawyers in the South who are eminently qualified in my judgment to sit on the Supreme Court.

The problem with Judge Carswell is not his conservatism, but rather his views on the specific question of equality under the law and equality before the bench regardless of race. I do not think there is a liberal-conservative division on this score.

All men in this country are now presumably committed—particularly if they are sitting on the bench—to accepting the constitutional guarantee of the equality of blacks and whites, regardless of their economic or social views on other questions.

Once the Court had spoken on the question of segregation, it became obligatory on those who hold positions on the bench to accept that decision as binding on them in their opinions. That does not mean that they cannot hold differing views on the war in Vietnam, or on the minimum wage law, or on the wisdom of student dissent.

But it does mean that conservatives are no more entitled to deviate from the constitutional guarantee of equal justice for the races than are liberals.

I would agree with the gentleman's statement and feel it is quite proper, but I do not think it applies in the case of Judge Carswell.

Mr. LANDGREBE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANDGREBE. Mr. Speaker, I would not think that anyone nominated for this very high office would have a really warped judgment on those matters, but then I think what you have to see in this argument is the matter of what people consider to be fair.

Sometimes it is a matter of what direction you look—whose ox is being gored and things of that kind.

With the deepest respect to my colleague, the gentleman from New York, it is I think in all honesty possible for you to have a slightly different idea of what is fair in certain instances than I would consider to be fair.

But, I would hope that all in all Judge Carswell would give us an amount of respect, or respectable actions on the court that would return peace and safety and give all of the things that we have lost in our country in the last few years—whether you wish to call it liberalism or conservatism—I would hate to think, and I know I do not think, of anyone being less important than myself. But there are instances in our country—and we could debate and discuss these things all night long. I do appreciate the opportunity to be permitted to be involved in this debate for a few moments.

Mr. CONYERS. May I say to the gentleman from Indiana who originally began his remarks objecting to the fact that this discussion was under way may have made something of an important contribution in this discussion in that he has helped us to further delineate certain of the issues with regard to the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell. I hope the gentleman will agree with us now that this does serve a useful purpose, even if the House itself does not pass on the confirmation directly.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONYERS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I especially want to express my gratitude to the gentleman from Indiana for participating. I think one of the things that needs to happen more frequently in the House of Representatives is for Members with different views to take time to discuss their differences, since the normal rules of debate make it impossible to do so when we are considering legislation. We are indebted to the gentleman from Indiana for being here and expressing his thoughts. I would call to his attention and to the attention of the House that when the appointment of Mr. Justice Fortas to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court was proposed, there was a great deal of discussion by some of the same people who now suggest that there is no reason to discuss the appointment of Carswell. It seems to depend on whose ox is being gored, and ultimately it is the national ox that gets gored if inadequate or prejudiced men rise to the Highest Court.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. CONYERS. Might I point out to my colleague from Indiana before he leaves that I heard his remarks with reference to black people in America but did not, however, clearly understand them. As I think I heard him remark in the course of this discussion, he thought that black people, who themselves are the victims of crime, would appreciate a man with the background, character, and temperament of G. Harrold Carswell going to the Supreme Court. Did I understand my colleague from Indiana correctly on that score, if he would care further to join us in this edifying discussion?

Mr. LANDGREBE. I think I am going to "chicken out" here eventually. I did say that I know from personal contact that there are many fine Americans—and I wish we did not have to talk about color; I wish we would consider ourselves as Americans. I am proud of my ancestry as I am sure you are, too—I would just like to be able to say that there are Americans who are terribly concerned about what has happened to our country recently, in the last few years. Much of it seems to be attributable directly to decisions handed down by the Supreme Court.

If Judge Carswell, regardless of his background or stature, could bring some—a little bit more stability to that Court, I am sure there are people of all races, creeds, and color who would be appreciative.

Mr. CONYERS. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that clarification. I have been in touch with a number of black Americans and white Americans as well, and I genuinely regret the necessity of distinguishing American citizens on the basis of color, the same as the gentleman does. It has been, however, my overwhelming understanding that the great majority of black Americans are very sincerely opposed to this nomination. I would point out to my friend from Indiana that what I consider very important and crucial in this particular nomination and this discussion is that we are really trying to develop a new criteria that will be hopefully regarded not only by the President, who makes the initial nomination, but also by the U.S. Senate as they ratify and confirm such a nomination. That new, and to some people startling, criteria is that any candidate nominated for the U.S. Supreme Court would have a background and a career that would affirmatively demonstrate that he does not have the segregationist or racist persuasion that would impede him from fully honoring the Constitution as it should apply to all Americans.

I am sure the gentleman would agree with me on this new principle we are trying to develop.

Mr. LANDGREBE. I am not sure I can agree with it, because certainly I am not as well read on this new principle the gentleman is talking about, but I and many of the folks I have been in touch with recently would like to go back to some of the good old traditional pro-American beliefs, and so on, in hopes that all of us—all of us—would have a little brighter future and a little safer journey through this life.

I do not know how long we can go on experimenting before we get back to some of the tried and true. Certainly that does not mean the idea of not using anybody except those who just simply will not obey the law and are determined to take my rights and the rights of anyone and abuse them.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am hopeful we can go back to these old tried and true principles of American democracy, but eliminate the racist considerations that have not always been absent from our history. In other words, I do not see any conflict with this new principle that we are trying to establish.

I am really reluctant and ashamed to say that this is a new principle since our Constitution makes no racial distinctions and since nowhere in any of our Federal instruments is there any suggestion that any ethnic group should be treated in any way differently from any other ethnic group. It is something of a travesty, I suggest to my colleagues, that we have to come before the House today in this kind of discussion and say we are, in fact, introducing a new criterion in determining who should be fit to serve on the U.S. Supreme Court. It would seem that this should have been the case all along—quite frankly—that anyone who has a segregationist background is automatically disqualified from service on the Highest Court in the land.

It seems to me that the previous nomination and the rejection of it involving Judge Clement Haynsworth established a very fundamental principle that those who have a conflict of interest should be excluded from participation on the Supreme Court.

I think now we have moved to an even more fundamental ground, that those who have a racist background are automatically disabled from serving on the U.S. Supreme Court. I am hoping this will begin to have its telling effect. Perhaps democracy is working in its finest sense in this way. Perhaps the American people are indicating, not on a regional or a class or a racial basis, that the Highest Court in this land—those nine men who alone of anyone in America have the right to set aside legislation brought forth by Congress—should be itself an instrument which should be not just questionably removed from any segregationist attitudes but which should be unquestionably, beyond the shadow of a doubt, beyond any reasonable question, removed from such attitudes, and that the men who come to this court from this point on should have no background that in any way raises this issue.

It seems to me, on the matter of G. Harrold Carswell, we have really been arguing about whether he is a reformed racist, whether he is an ex-segregationist. Of course, that misses the whole point of what we are looking for in qualities of members of the Supreme Court.

We are not looking for members on this great and august body of people who can prove that although they may have had these disabling attitudes they no longer have them. We are looking for far more than that. We are looking for men of the bar in America who have positive attributes, for whom there is not only no question that they are not segregationists, but affirmatively that these men have made and are able to make the kinds of mental and legal contributions which will give America, and black America in particular, the kind of Government which is so desperately needed as the questions revolving on the relevance of this Congress, on the presence of mind of the whole administration in terms of its handling of one immediate domestic crisis after the other, are presented.

It seems to me at no other time in our recent history have we needed more positive indications of this kind of confidence.

Of course, when we are reduced to arguing whether or not a particular nominee is or is not a segregationist, whether he is or is not mediocre, that is of course begging the question. When that becomes the level of debate, it seems to me that the case against him has been already completely made. There can be little doubt when an argument is reduced to that low level, that the man is, beyond any question in my mind, unfit to serve on the bench.

To establish, if I might, that this is not a partisan consideration, I should like to indicate that one of my colleagues and friends from Michigan, Congressman RIEGLE, only very recently made a very compelling statement, in my judgment, which indicated that he, too, joined with many others in differing with the President of the United States on this nomination.

I am going to introduce into the RECORD at this time a statement of the Ripon Society which has made, it seems to me, a very impartial and dispassionate evaluation of the disabling features that have caused us to speak out against this nomination.

The Ripon Society paper follows:

THE CASE AGAINST CARSWELL: A RIPON SOCIETY PAPER

The Ripon Society urges Republican Senators to uphold their party's best traditions by rejecting confirmation of the nomination of Judge G. Harrold Carswell to the United States Supreme Court. While very damning evidence concerning Judge Carswell's judicial impartiality has already come to light, the most manifest reason for refusing confirmation to this nomination is the undeniable legal inadequacy of Judge Carswell.

Virtually all legal historians and scholars who have examined G. Harrold Carswell's record have found him to be one of the least qualified, if not the least qualified, nominee to the United States Supreme Court in the twentieth century. Exhaustive studies which have been performed jointly in the last month by a large number of lawyers and law students and which are being released for the first time in this Ripon Society paper give extremely strong statistical corroboration to the contention of judicial scholars that G. Harrold Carswell is seriously deficient in the legal skills necessary to be even a minimally competent Supreme Court Justice.

I. THE LEGAL INADEQUACY OF JUDGE CARSWELL

Legal scholars who have examined G. Harrold Carswell's judicial opinions (Carswell has written no scholarly articles) or who have studied his record have concluded that Carswell lacks any legal distinction whatever.

Duke University Law School Professor William Van Alstyne, who testified in favor of the Haynsworth nomination testified of Carswell: "There is in candor, nothing in the quality of the nominee's work to warrant any expectation whatever that he could serve with distinction on the Supreme Court of the United States."

Yale University Law School's Luce Professor of Jurisprudence, Charles L. Black, Jr., himself a native of Texas, has stated of Carswell, "There can hardly be any pretense that he possesses any outstanding talent at all."

Twenty professors at the University of Pennsylvania Law School have announced concerning Carswell: "Our examination of his opinions in various areas of the law compels the conclusion that he is an undistinguishable member of his profession, lacking claim to intellectual stature."

After thoroughly examining Judge Carswell's opinions of recent years, Louis Pollack, Dean of Yale University Law School, testified to the Senate Judiciary Committee: "I am impelled to conclude that the nominee presents more slender credentials than any nominee for the Supreme Court put forth in this century, and this century began as I remind this committee with the elevation to the Supreme Court of the United States of the Chief Justice of Massachusetts Oliver Wendell Holmes."

An exhaustive statistical study recently completed by a number of lawyers and law students organized by Law Students Concerned for the Court reveals some very damaging information concerning Judge Carswell's judical record. After a careful examination of the statistics yielded by the study and of the soundness of the methodology used in obtaining them, the Ripon Society concludes that these statistics strongly corroborate the contentions of legal scholars that Judge Carswell is an exceptionally inadequate federal judge besides being a poorly qualified Supreme Court nominee. This study yielded the following results:

1. Reversals on Appeal. During the eleven years (1958–1969) in which Judge Carswell sat on the federal district court in Tallahassee, 58.8% of all of those cases where he wrote printed opinions (as reported by West) and which were appealed resulted ultimately in reversals by higher courts. By contrast in a random sample of 400 district court opinions the average rate of reversals among all federal district judges during the same time period was 20.2% of all printed opinions on appeal. In a random sample of 100 district court cases from the Fifth Circuit during the 1958–1969 time period the average rate of reversals was 24.0% of all printed opinions on appeal.[1]

2. Reversals in General. Carswell's rate of reversals for all of his printed cases was 11.9% as compared to a rate of 5.3% for all federal district cases and 6% for all district cases within the Fifth Circuit during the same time period.

The majority of cases before any federal district judge ordinarily do not result in appeals, hence precluding the possibility of reversals in those cases. It is significant however, that Carswell's overall reversal record for his printed cases is more than twice the average for federal district judges. When additional unprinted opinions revealed by the testimony of Joseph L. Rauh, Jr. before the Senate Judiciary Committee and by the memorandum of Senator Hruska are included, Carswell is found to have an overall reversal rate of 21.6%. [For further discussion refer to the statistical summary in the appendix to this paper.]

3. Citation by Others. Carswell's 84 printed opinions while he was serving as a district court judge were cited significantly less often by all other U.S. judges than is the average for the opinions of federal district judges. Carswell's first 42 opinions during his first five years on the federal judiciary (1958–1963) have been cited an average of 1.8 times per opinion. Two hundred opinions of other district judges randomly chosen from district court cases spanning this same time period have been cited an average of 3.75 times per opinion. The 42 most recent of Carswell's printed district court opinions have been cited an average of 0.77 times per opinion. Two hundred opinions of other district judges randomly chosen from cases spanning the same 1964–1969 time period have been cited an average of 1.57 times per opinion.

4. Elaboration of Opinions. Carswell's printed district court opinions average 2.0 pages. The average length of printed opinions for all federal district judges during the time period in which Carswell sat on the district bench was 4.2 pages.[2]

5. Use of Authority. In the 84 above-mentioned printed Carswell opinions the average number of citations of cases is 4.07 per opinion, and the average number of citations of secondary source material is 0.49 per opinion.[3] The average for all district judges during the 1958-1968 time period was 9.93 case citations per opinion and 1.56 citations of secondary source material per opinion.

When these results are analyzed cumulatively they form a most impressive indictment of Judge Carswell's judicial competence. The incredibly high rate of reversals (59%) which Carswell has incurred on appeals in those cases in which he has written printed opinions brings into serious doubt the nominee's ability to understand and apply established law.

The shortness of a particular opinion and the relative paucity within it of case citations and citations of secondary materials do not necessarily indicate deficiency. Short opinions which are succinct and logical display great legal virtuosity, as Justice Holmes demonstrated. Yet not even Carswell's strongest supporters could argue seriously that the nominee's opinions have shown any unusual conciseness, perceptiveness, or skill. The very fact that Judge Carswell was so rarely cited by other federal judges who as a group are best equipped to evaluate the weight to be given to a judge's opinion underscores the generally low quality of Carswell's opinions. We are led inevitably to the conclusion that the shortness and slim documentation of most of Carswell's opinions is evidence of either Carswell's lack of diligence or his lack of ability.

The Senate Judiciary Committee record shows the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reversing Judge Carswell again and again for failing to follow established legal procedures. Of particular concern was Carswell's failure to grant adequate hearings to individual petitioners in civil rights and criminal cases. [Attached to this paper is an appendix summarizing a number of these cases.]

Judge Carswell is said to have boasted that he almost never held an evidentiary hearing in the federal equivalent of a habeas corpus case. This cavalier attitude on Carswell's part is yet another example of his insensitivity to essential individual rights dating at least as far back as the Magna Carta. Judge Carswell's attitude in habeas corpus cases, as well as in the civil rights area, suggests that his constructionism has been more "selective" than "strict."

The analysis of Judge Carswell's record during his eleven years on the federal district court would suggest that the nominee was significantly below the level of the average federal district court judge. There is no evidence to suggest that Carswell possesses any unusual talent to raise him above other federal judges. G. Harrold Carswell's performance in the short time since he was appointed to the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals

[3] These averages for all federal district judges were derived from another random sampling of 80 opinions drawn from Federal Supplements spanning the 1958–1969 period. Citations for any reason are included in these computations.

Whatever their legal philosophies, young lawyers, law students, and law professors have reacted with overwhelming dismay to the appointment of such a mediocre lawyer to the Supreme Court. These individuals who form a major portion of the Ripon Society's constituency are fully aware of the enduring character of a Supreme Court appointment, especially that of a man as young as Carswell.

This dismay is felt generally throughout the legal profession. The vote of the Standing Committee on the Judiciary of the American Bar Association finding Carswell qualified is unrepresentative of membership sentiment within either the overall bar or the American Bar Association. Significantly the Chairman of this Standing Committee is the same man who as Deputy Attorney General of the United States played a major role in 1958 in the selection of Carswell to the federal bench in the first instance.

II. CARSWELL FALLS SHORT OF REPUBLICAN STANDARDS FOR JUDICIAL DISTINCTION

During the twentieth century Republican Presidents have maintained a remarkable standard in choosing judicial statesmen for the Court. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Charles Evans Hughes, William Howard Taft, Harlan Fiske Stone, Owen J. Roberts, Benjamin Cardozo, Earl Warren, John Marshall Harlan, William Brennan and Potter Stewart have all made significant contributions to American jurisprudence. The Ripon Society welcomed Mr. Nixon's campaign pledge to appoint to our nation's highest court persons of the caliber of Holmes, Brandeis, and Cardozo. Yet the members of the Ripon Society and many other concerned Americans find themselves deeply disappointed with the quality of recent nominations to the Supreme Court made by the present administration.

The Haynsworth nomination was inadequate to the national need to restore public confidence in the integrity of the judiciary in the wake of the Fortas resignation. Yet far more important than the possible vulnerability of Judge Haynsworth to conflict of interest charges was his limited sensitivity to the rights of blacks and labor. Judge Haynsworth, although a decent man, did not meet either in judicial insight or craftsmanship the standards of greatness which a nation demanded.

The duty which Republican Senators deliberating on the Carswell nomination owe to the Court and to the best traditions of the Republican Party transcends any duty to support a President of their own party on his Court nominee. They do the President no disservice by preventing a mistake which is likely to endure long after the President's tenure in the White House. In fact, by opening this seat once more to a Presidential nomination Senators could enable the President to put on the Supreme Court a person of greatness.

Legal inadequacy of a Court appointee has historically been a principal ground for the rejection of a number of Supreme Court nominees. President Grant withdrew the nominations of George H. Williams of Oregon and Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts after public outcries based largely on their mediocrity. Two of President Cleveland's nominees, William B. Hornblower and Wheeler H. Peckham, were rejected by the Senate largely because they were felt to lack either the impartiality or the stature necessary for the judiciary.

III. CARSWELL'S LACK OF JUDICIAL IMPARTIALITY

Although it may be true that most people including judges have biases of one sort or another, it is incumbent on a judge in fulfilling his judicial function that he rise above these biases and adopt a neutral posture as an adjudicator of the law. Yet Judge Carswell through his decisions and his other uses of judicial power has seemed to eschew the role of impartiality demanded of a judge.

When he was serving as a federal district judge, Judge Carswell achieved the astonishing record of reversal in a tremendous number of civil rights decisions. Fifteen times Carswell was unanimously reversed on civil rights cases by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

Carswell's 1948 election speech declaring undying allegiance to the principles of white supremacy is deplorable, but we fully recognize that such ill-spoken words can be surmounted by men with a potential for growth. The example of Justice Hugo Black comes readily to mind. Judge Carswell during his entire time of federal service, however, has shown no growth either in legal ability or in sensitivity to the rights of black Americans.

In 1956 when he was serving as a United States attorney responsible for upholding the rights of members of all races, G. Harrold Carswell acted as an incorporator of a private club set up to take over the municipal golf course to prevent its integration. Judge Carswell's recent denials that he knew the private club was set up to maintain segregation seem disingenuous in the extreme.

More disturbing than the golf course incident, however, has been the blatantly anti-Negro, anti-civil rights character of Judge Carswell's conduct on the federal bench. In his letter of reply to Senate Judiciary Committee members who had queried him concerning charges of activity on his part to stifle civil rights workers, Judge Carswell failed to make any denial of some severe charges of judicial misconduct. He left unrebutted the charge that while he served in Tallahassee as a federal district judge he arranged with a local sheriff to rejail some civil rights workers he had been ordered to free by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals.

The testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee suggested that in one case Judge Carswell granted a writ of habeas corpus, required the prisoners' attorney to serve the writ on the sheriff at the jail, then notified the sheriff that he had remanded the case to local jurisdiction so the prisoners could be rearrested before they left the jail.

Other unrebutted testimony had alleged that Judge Carswell commuted sentences of civil rights workers for the purpose of preserving illegal local practices. Faced with a legal necessity to overturn the convictions of certain civil rights workers, Judge Carswell allegedly advised the city attorney that if he commuted their sentences to time already served the matter would become moot.

Judge Carswell's continuing involvement as a charterer of a segregated Florida State University Boosters Club, his passage of property in 1966 under a racially restrictive covenant, and his telling of a tasteless "darky" joke as speaker at a recent public gathering of the Georgia Bar Association are all indication that G. Harrold Carswell has not progressed appreciably beyond the views expressed in his 1948 campaign speech.

IV. THE CARSWELL NOMINATION IS AN INSULT TO SOUTHERN JURISPRUDENCE

Our opposition to the Carswell appointment in no way derives from the nominee's Southern origin. A number of great towers of our nation's judiciary are Southerners. Such men as Judge John R. Brown of Texas, Elbert Tuttle of Georgia, John Minor Wisdom of Louisiana and Frank Johnson of Alabama all have displayed an unflinching devotion to the Constitution of the United States and have exhibited a moral courage of high degree. Justice Hugo Black of Alabama has established himself as one of the great jurists of American history.

Both today and throughout our nation's history the South has produced first-rate legal minds. A Virginian, John Marshall, has had as great an influence as any American judge on the development of our legal institutions. The first Justice John M. Harlan from Kentucky and Justice L. Q. C. Lamar from Mississippi both demonstrated the high potential of Southern legal scholarship.

In passing over so many well qualified Southern lawyers and jurists, the choice of Carswell seems an insult to Southern jurisprudence. Unhappily a man lacking in both intellectual distinction and in judicial fairness is presented to the nation as representative of Southern jurisprudence.

CONCLUSION

Persuaded that G. Harrold Carswell lacks either the intellectual stature or the judicial impartiality to qualify for a place on our nation's highest court, we urge the Republican members of the Senate to uphold their party's best traditions by denying confirmation to G. Harrold Carswell's nomination thus allowing President Nixon to submit the name of a person who can command national respect both for his or her fairness and legal stature.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF REVERSALS OF JUDGE CARSWELL

Judge Carswell has been reversed by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals and by the United States Supreme Court at least 33 times. A brief description of some of those cases follows.

Augustus v. Board of Pub. Instr. of Escambria County, Fla., 185 F.Supp 450 (1960). Judge Carswell was unanimously reversed by the Fifth Circuit, 306 F.2d 862 (1962) for striking portions of Negro children's complaint asking integration of school facilities. He held they had no standing to enjoin teacher assignments based on race, which he said was like enjoining "teachers who were too strict or too lenient." (p. 453). The Fifth Circuit criticized Carswell's ruling: "Whether as a question of law or one of fact, we do not think that a matter of such importance should be decided on a motion to strike. As well said by the Sixth Circuit: '. . . it is well established that the action of striking a pleading should be sparingly used by the courts. . . . It is a drastic remedy to be resorted to only when required for the purposes of justice.' " (p. 868)

In the same opinion, the Fifth Circuit also unanimously reversed Judge Carswell's school desegregation plan order of 1961, 6 Race Rel. L. Rept. 689, which was merely to permit continued assignment of pupils under Florida's Pupil Assignment Law, which the Fifth Circuit had twice held, in both 1959 and 1960, to be inadequate to meet the Brown requirement, because it was "administered . . . in a manner to maintain complete segregation in fact." (p. 869) After being reversed Carswell waited four months to implemen the Fifth Circuit's decision, then postponed the effective date of the plan for 10 months more.

Steel v. Board of Pub. Instr. of Leon County, Fla., 8 Race Rel.L.Rep. 934 (1963), decided by Judge Carswell 10 months after the Augustus reversal, found him again approving assignments under the Pupil Assignment Law, then thrice held inadequate by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, and making token desegregation of only one grade per year beginning in 1963 despite the Fifth Circuit's statement in Augustus: "[If it is too late to integrate for the 1962 year] then the plan should provide for such elimination as to the first two grades for the 1963 fall term." (p. 869, emphasis added) Two years after Carswell's 1963 order the Negro children moved to have him speed up the plan in compliance with subsequent Supreme Court rulings, and Carswell refused to reorganize the plan, telling their attorney, "it would just be an idle gesture regardless of the nature of the testimony." The Fifth Circuit unanimously reversed both of Carswell's orders, 371 F.2d 395, instructing him to follow its subsequent definitive Jefferson ruling extending the earlier precedents.

Youngblood v. Board of Pub. Instr. of Bay County, Fla., 230 F.Supp 74 (1964), two years after the reversal in Augustus, was another Carswell decision unanimously reversed by the Fifth Circuit, (No. 27683, Dec. 1, 1969), in which he had permitted token desegregation under the disapproved Pupil Assignment Law, and even that delayed for 16 months. Carswell's plan allowed only for so-called "freedom of choice" transfers during a five-day registration period and parents would have to come to the superintendent's office during working hours. His plan was again a grade-a-year plan, violating the Fifth Circuit's then one-month-old decision in Armstrong, 333 F.2d 47 (1964).

Subsequent motions in Youngblood denied by Carswell also violated precedents unmistakably clear at the time of denial. For example, in 1965, when Carswell refused to speed up his grade-a-year plan, such plans had already been clearly held unconstitutional by the Third Circuit (Evans, 281 F.2d 385 (1960)), Fourth Circuit (Jackson, 321 F.2d 230 (1963), Haynsworth, J., concurring), Sixth Circuit (Goss, 301 F.2d 164 (1962), rev'd on other grounds 373 U.S. 683) and Eighth Circuit, and Carswell's own Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals had held months earlier, in Lockett, 342 F.2d 225 (1965): "It was then [after Calhoun, 377 U.S. 263 (1964)] beyond peradventure that shortening of the transition period was mandatory." (p. 277) Similarly after the Justice Department intervened to support plaintiffs' motions to substitute effective methods in place of so-called "freedom of choice" transfers, Carswell on August 12, 1968 and April 3, 1969 approved "freedom of choice"—all of this after the U.S. Supreme Court on May 27, 1968 held: "The New Kent School Board's 'freedom-of-choice' plan cannot be accepted as a sufficient step to 'effectuate a transition' to a unitary system." " . . . experience under 'freedom of choice' to date has been such as to indicate its ineffectiveness . . ." Green, 391 U.S. 430, 440, 441.

Wright v. Board of Pub. Instr. of Alachua County, Fla., unreported, unanimously reversed by the Fifth Circuit (No. 27983, 1969) repeats the story of Youngblood.

Singleton v. Board of Comm'rs of State Institutions, 11 Race Rel.L.Rep. 903 (1964) was another segregation decision by Carswell unanimously reversed by the Fifth Circuit, 356 F.2d 771 (1966). In a 99-word opinion he held that inmates had no standing to seek desegregation of reform schools because before he had rendered judgment they had been released on conditional parole. The Court of Appeals decisively rejected that notion: "The plaintiffs' probationary status brings them well within the future-use requirement for standing." It relied on its own Anderson decision, 321 F.2d 649, rendered a year before Carswell's order.

Due v. Tallahassee Theatres, Inc., 9 Race Rel.L.Rep. (1963), still another segregation case in which Judge Carswell denied even an evidentiary hearing, also resulted in unanimous reversal by the Fifth Circuit, 333 F.2d 630 (1964). In a suit seeking desegregation of theatres and alleging a conspiracy between the theatres, the city and the sheriff, Carswell dismissed the complaint as against the theatres and the city for failure to state a justiciable claim, and granted summary judgment on the sheriff's affidavit denying that there was any conspiracy. The Fifth Circuit held that both of his actions plainly violated clear pre-existing law: "this Court has repeatedly held that if the complaint alleges facts, which, under any theory of the law, would entitle the complainant to recover, the action may not be dismissed for failure to state a claim. Arthur H. Richland Company v. Harper, 5 Cir., 302 F.2d 324 [1962]. There is no doubt about the fact that the allegations here stated a claim on which relief could be granted, if the facts were proved. See Lombard v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 267 [May, 1963 (5 months before Carswell's decision)]." (p. 631) And on the issue of granting summary judgment without a trial: "There clearly remained issues of fact to be determined on a full trial of the case . . . " (p. 633).

Dawkins v. Green, 285 F. Supp 772 (1968) was, as the Fifth Circuit recognized in its unanimous reversal of Carswell's grant of summary judgment for the defendants, 412 F. 2d 644 (1969), a case similar to the well-known Dombrowski v. Pfister, 380 U.S. 479 (1965). The plaintiffs were Negro civil rights workers, suing public officials and alleging that the defendants had initiated prosecutions in bad faith to retaliate for and to chill their exercise of constitutional rights in civil rights activities. The public officials filed affidavits, described by the Fifth Circuit as "simply a restatement of the denials contained in their answer . . . they set forth only ultimate facts or conclusions . . . that they did not enforce the laws against plaintiffs in bad faith." (p. 646) Carswell held that, "From the proofs here it is clear that there was no harassment, intimidation or oppression . . . and they are being prosecuted in good faith . . . "(p. 774) Once more, the Fifth Circuit cited its own clear pre-existing law on summary judgments in reversing Carswell: "No facts were present so that the trial Court could arrive at its own conclusions. As discussed in Woods v. Allied Concord Financial Corporation, (Del), 373 F.2d 733 (5 Cir. 1967), in summary judgment proceedings, affidavits containing mere conclusions have no probative value." (p. 646)

In at least 10 habeas corpus cases, Carswell was unanimously reversed by the Fifth Circuit for refusing to permit petitioners the opportunity to prove facts they alleged, which if proven would have clearly—under then-existing rulings—entitled them to relief, except perhaps in Beufve, below, where substantive law was clarified in the interim. The 10 cases are listed first, then discussed:

Dickey v. United States, 345 F. 2d 508 (5th Cir. 1965);

Rowe v. United States, 345 F. 2d 795 (5th Cir. 1965);

Beufve v. United States, 344 F. 2d 958 (5th Cir. 1965);

Baker v. Wainwright, 391 F. 2d 248 (5th Cir. 1968);

Dawkins v. Crevasse, 391 F. 2d 921 (5th Cir. 1968);

Brown v. Wainwright, 394 F. 2d 153 (5th Cir. 1968);

Cole v. Wainwright, 397 F. 2d 810 (5th Cir. 1968);

Harris v. Wainwright, 399 F. 2d 142 (5th Cir. 1968); and

Barnes v. State of Florida, 402 F. 2d 63 (5th Cir. 1968).

Following is some of the Fifth Circuit's language in its peremptory reversals, citing Carswell to controlling precedent:

MEADOWS. "We think that the allegations of the motion, inartful though they be, are sufficient to set forth the contention [that mental illness voided effective waivers and guilty plea]. His statements of prior determination of a mental illness takes the motion out of the category of frivolous claims and requires a hearing. Bishop v. United States, 350 U.S. 961 [1956]."

DICKEY. "the prisoner was entitled to an evidentiary hearing. Gregori v. United States, 5 Cir., 243 F. 2d 48 [1957]."

ROWE. The entire Fifth Circuit opinion states: "The appellant sought relief under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2255 from a mail fraud conviction. The district court denied relief. Merrill v. United States, 5th Cir. 1964, 338 F.2d 763, requires a reversal." The Fifth Circuit's order then not only reversed and remanded, but added the unusual directions to vacate the conviction and sentence and dismiss the indictment.

BAKER. "[Defendant] sought habeas corpus relief in the district court on the ground that he was denied the right to counsel on the appeal from this conviction. The court denied relief without a hearing. . . . In Entsminger v. Iowa, 1966, 386 U.S. 748 . . . the Supreme Court said: 'As we have held again and again, an indigent defendant is entitled to the appointment of counsel to assist him on his first appeal! . . . . [T]he cause is remanded for an evidentiary hearing . . . ."

DAWKINS (the same Dawkins as in Carswell's summary judgment reversal). "We conclude that the Trial Judge erred in not granting a writ of habeas corpus at least to the extent of ordering appellants' release on bail pending their appeal in the Florida courts. We . . . direct the District Judge to enter an order granting bail in the amount of $1000 . . . ."

COLE. The entire Fifth Circuit reversal states: "The allegations of the petitioner are of such a nature as to require a hearing under 28 U.S.C.A. § 2243. It could not appear from the application and the file supplied by the state 'that the applicant . . . [was] not entitled' to the writ."

BARNES. "[Defendant] alleges coercion of a plea of guilty and ineffective assistance of counsel, contending that court-appointed counsel, whom he saw only for a few minutes four days before trial and a few minutes prior to trial, coerced him into pleading guilty, assuring him that a deal had been made for shorter sentences. . . . If appellant's allegations as to what occurred at his arraignment and sentence are found to be true, he is entitled to have the writ granted and his conviction set aside. Holloway v. Dutton, 5 Cir., 1968, 396 F.2d 127; Roberts v. Dutton, 5 Cir. 1966, 368 F.2d 465. . . ."

In addition to the Fifth Circuit's frequent unanimous reversals of Carswell for failing even to hear the claims of civil rights and habeas corpus petitioners, the appellate court sharply rebuked his judgment for a bank in a National Banking Act case, Dickenson v. First National Bank, 400 F.2d 548 (1968). The issue was whether the bank's shopping center receptacle and armored car messenger service constituted illegal "branch banking" under Florida law. "The district court granted judgment for First National stating explicitly: 'Florida statute 659.06(1)(a) is not operative or controlling in this instance.' We conclude that in this instance Florida law is operative and controlling and reverse." Carswell held that the lacking of inclusion of the bank's activities in the words of the federal statute (Section 36(f)) ended the matter, and ignored the reference of another section to activities permissible under state law. Of his dubious reasoning, the Fifth Circuit stated: "Congress is in the defining business and is knowledgeable as to how to immunize or deimmunize an activity from its statutory engulfment. In Section 36(f) Congress provided only that the term 'branch' 'shall be held to include' . . . . Such a provision is hardly adequate as a definition . . . ." If we construed Section 36(f) as permitting paper evasions from state anti-branching laws, we would be letting the left hand give and the right hand take away. Statutory construction has not fallen to such legalistic depths. (p. 557, emphasis added)

[1] 12 of the 15 reversals by the 5th Cir. C.A. in civil rights and habeas corpus which were mentioned in the testimony of Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., had no printed opinion below by Carswell; 44 additional appeals of criminal trials and 12 more habeas appeals were Senator Hruska's memo.

So it seems a very large consensus has already developed that urges the Members of the Senate to do for the President what he himself said he would do. I should like to quote the President in his remarks made when he accepted the Republican nomination in August of 1968. This Executive Officer who nominated G. Harrold Carswell said:

Let those who have the responsibility to enforce the laws and our judges who have the responsibility to interpret them be dedicated to the great principles of civil rights.

If we are to honor that statement—and I believe this is one of the statements of the President which needs serious support—it would seem to me that there is no way to rationally argue in support of G. Harrold Carswell as one who is dedicated to the great principles of civil rights.

We have had countless testimony made before the U.S. Senate and the Judiciary Committee, that went into great evaluation of his white supremacy speech and recalled in great detail his participation in the golf course resegregation in 1956, if you please, and his treatment, as a member of the bench, of civil rights lawyers in his court, and of his treatment of defendants in his court, and of his lack of professional qualifications and his lack of sensitivity as a member of the Federal bench. A most telling statement, in my judgment, has been issued by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights entitled, "Has judge Carswell changed?" The statement is as follows:

HAS JUDGE CARSWELL CHANGED?

THAT WHITE SUPREMACY SPEECH

On August 3, 1948, George Harrold Carswell, President Nixon's new nominee to the U.S. Supreme Court, addressed a chapter of the American Legion in Gordon, Georgia and declared: ". . . segregation of the races is proper and the only and correct way of life in our state. I have always so believed and I shall always so act.

"I shall be the last to submit to any attempt on the part of anyone to break down and to weaken this firmly established policy of our people . . . I yield to no man . . . in the firm, vigorous belief in the principles of white supremacy and I shall always be so governed."

There is no recorded statement disavowing those view until 1970. Then, shortly after his nomination was announced, a reporter found the text of the old speech in the files of Judge Carswell's hometown newspaper, and when he was confronted with it, Judge Carswell repudiated it, saying it was "obnoxious and abhorrent."

His defenders have sought to excuse him. The speech was made when he was young; it was given in the heat of a campaign for the Georgia legislature. Any anyhow, he has since had a change of mind and heart.

Well, men do change. But was this speech simply a young man's political wild oats, the indiscretion of a moment, or an expression of his deepest beliefs? And has he changed or does he, consciously or unconsciously, still cling to those views? These are crucial questions for anyone considering Judge Carswell's qualifications for the Supreme Court.

YOUTH?

First, how readily can Judge Carswell be forgiven for what he said? In 1948 he was 28, scarcely a callow youth. One must also remember the national mood at that time. Judge Carswell spoke only three years after World War II, a war in which he served as a naval officer. It was a war fought against the Hitlerian creed of racial superiority and one wonders how any sensitive man could have come through that war and emerged as an advocate of white supremacy. In 1948 we were fully aware, as a nation, that Germany was not the only country poisoned by race hatred. It was just about the time that a Presidential committee had issued the landmark report, "To Secure These Rights," and faced Americans with some awful truths about themselves: the terrible inequalities visited upon Negro Americans and the stark terror of their lives in the deep South and, of course, in Georgia.

In this context—the immediate aftermath of World War II, the growing recognition of the enormity of America's racial problem—is it possible to excuse as mere youthful excess this passionate avowal of white supremacy?

If Judge Carswell's subsequent record showed a change of heart it might still be possible to excuse him. But if he has forsworn his old beliefs, where is the evidence? There is nothing whatever to support his belated disavowal. On the contrary, our own examination of whatever is available on the record—his public acts, his judicial opinions, his treatment of civil rights lawyers and his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee—all suggest those old views still shape his words and deeds.

THE GOLF COURSE INCIDENT: 1956

On April 24, 1956, some citizens of Tallahassee, Florida, where Judge Carswell was then residing, formed a corporation whose purpose was to take over the publicly-owned golf course, where Negroes played on a restricted basis and convert it to a private club where Negroes could not play. Judge Carswell, who was the U.S. Attorney at the time, sworn to uphold the Federal law, was an incorporator and a director of the club.

In his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, he denied, at first, that he was an incorporator. Shown a document in which his name appeared, he admitted he was one. He denied he was a director of the club; a corporate resolution shows he was. Even so, he insisted before the Judiciary Committee that he had no notion of wrongdoing, "I have never had any discussion or never heard anyone discuss anything, that this might be an effort to take public lands and turn them into private hands for a discriminatory purpose."

Yet the transaction came only a short time after a 1965 Supreme Court decision that public golf courses could not discriminate against Negroes and while a case to desegregate a golf course was pending in his own jurisdiction. If Judge Carswell didn't know what was going on, practically everyone else in Tallahassee did.

Affidavits from three residents of the city were filed with the Senate Judiciary Committee by Clarence Mitchell, Legislative Chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, in which it is asserted that the purpose of the transfer had been well-publicized. In one of the affidavits, the wife of the president of Florida's oldest bank, said, "I would have been surprised if there was any knowledgeable member of the community who was unaware of the racial aspect of the golf course transaction." She and her husband refused to join, she said, "because of the obvious racial subterfuge which was evident to the general public."

President Nixon sought to excuse his nominee at a press conference by saying "If everyone in this government had to give up his job if he belonged to a restricted golf course, Washington would have mass unemployment." But that was hardly responsive, since it was not Judge Carswell's membership in the club that was at issue, but his active participation in evading the law he was sworn to uphold.

HIS RECORD AS A JUDGE

Some idea of Mr. Carswell's performance as a judge can be gained from the analyses of his decisions presented to the committee, particularly some 15 rulings in which he was unanimously reversed by the Court of Appeals. Eight of these rulings were in the area of civil rights, seven involved individual rights.

In 1962, in a suit Negro parents brought to desegregate the Pensacola School system, Judge Carswell struck from the case an attack on the segregated faculty and staff and approved a defective school desegregation plan. The Court of Appeals unanimously reversed him on both points.

In 1964, Judge Carswell dismissed a suit alleging a conspiracy to deny Negroes the right to go to Tallahassee movie theaters. The Court of Appeals unanimously reversed him, saying the orders dismissing the complaint "were clearly in error."

In 1965, after civil rights lawyers transferred to Judge Carswell's District Court, cases in which seven civil rights workers had been jailed on trumped-up charges of criminal trespass when they went on to unposted property to talk to people about registering, Judge Carswell remanded the cases back to the local courts on his own motion and without a hearing. The U.S. Court of Appeals unanimously reversed him.

In 1966, Judge Carswell dismissed a case brought to end segregation in Florida reform schools on the ground that the children who filed the suit had no standing to sue since they were themselves reform school graduates. The Court of Appeals, in its unanimous reversal, said they did have standing.

In 1967, the U.S. Court of Appeals again unanimously reversed Judge Carswell in a case to desegregate the Tallahassee schools which began in 1964 and which Judge Carswell had managed to delay in one way or another for nearly three years. At one time he had denied the Negro parents' request for a hearing to show the existing desegregation plan was inadequate, saying that no evidence could persuade the court to change the plan and that the evidence "would just be an idle gesture regardless of the nature of that testimony."

In 1969, he was again reversed by a unanimous Court of Appeals in his handling of the suit to desegregate the schools in Bay County, Fla.

The examination of Judge Carswell's record disclosed seven other cases involving individual rights where Judge Carswell denied hearings to plaintiffs in criminal cases, showing an insensitivity to their plight. In each instance, his cold rejection of their pleas was reversed by the appellate court.

HIS TREATMENT OF CIVIL RIGHTS LAWYERS

In the course of the Senate Judiciary Committee hearings several civil rights attorneys testified as to the rude treatment Judge Carswell meted out to them and others when they appeared in his court.

Professor John Lowenthal of Rutgers University testified that Judge Carswell expressed dislike for civil rights lawyers during the summer of 1964 and took steps to block their efforts to help workers trying to register black voters in Florida.

In a letter he sent to the New York Times on January 20, Professor Lowenthal said that "Judge Carswell was well known to both local and out-of-town lawyers as a vigorous opponent of civil rights. As I encountered him, he was no 'strict constructionist' when it came to aiding the Old South's cause. Rather, he was such a 'judicial activist' that he seemed more the partisan lawyer than the disinterested judge one hopes to find on the Federal bench."

Ernst H. Rosenberger, a New York attorney, recalled that when he came before Judge Carswell in 1964 on a voting case, the Judge displayed hostility to northern lawyers. Asked by a Senator about the Judge's reputation for giving a fair trial to minority group members or civil rights workers, Mr. Rosenberger said: "His reputation was bad . . . his reputation was one of obstruction in civil rights litigation."

Norman Knopf, a young Justice Department lawyer who had also worked in Florida as a volunteer in 1964, found "extreme hostility" existing between the judge and northern volunteers. He "lectured a civil rights attorney in a high voice a long time," Knopf said, denouncing lawyers who came down South to "rouse" the local people. Mr. Knopf also recalled that in regard to a group of voter registration workers, Judge Carswell said "he would not let them out of jail and as long as he had the power to do that, he would keep them in. It wasn't until he was shown that he had to let them out that he did."

Professor Leroy D. Clark of New York University, who had represented the NAACP Legal Defense Fund in Florida during the sixties, said of Mr. Carswell, "he was probably the most hostile judge I've ever appeared before; he would rarely let me finish a sentence," and on occasion turned his back on Mr. Clark when he was arguing a case. "It was not unusual for Judge Carswell to shout at a black lawyer who appeared before him while using a civil tone to opposing counsel."

He was so "insulting" and "hostile" to Negro lawyers, Mr. Clark said, that when newcomers were getting ready to go before the court, he would spend the night before having them "go through their argument while I harassed them, as preparation for what they would meet the following day."

Judge Carswell's standing among other Southern judges was analyzed in a political science dissertation that Mrs. Myron P. Curzan submitted to Yale University in 1968. Mrs. Curzan considered the civil rights decisions of 31 Federal District judges appointed to posts in the deep South between 1953 and 1963. When she ranked them in terms of the number of times they ruled in favor of Negro plaintiffs, Judge Carswell ranked 23rd. Her study showed that 60 per cent of his civil rights decisions were reversed on appeal.

HIS TREATMENT OF DEFENDANTS

If Judge Carswell exhibited hostility to civil rights lawyers, he was scarcely kinder to those fighters for civil rights who got into trouble with the law and appeared before him.

Mr. Rosenberger recalled that in 1964 when he was representing 9 clergymen arrested at the Tallahassee airport for their activities as freedom riders, Judge Carswell sought to circumvent justice. The Judge suggested to the city attorney that the clergymen be freed at once, not for humanitarian reasons but because by freeing the men, he would deprive them of any standing to sue for habeas corpus and leave them with permanent criminal records from which there could be no appeal.

Other witnesses recalled that when a group of civil rights workers was transferred from federal to city court, somehow, through the agency of Judge Carswell's court, the sheriff was informed that he could rearrest them immediately after they were free and he did just that.

HIS LACK OF PROFESSIONAL QUALIFICATIONS

Judge Carswell has another serious disability: his undistinguished record as a legal scholar or jurist. When the Judiciary Committee asked him for a list of his legal articles and writings he said he had none.

Commenting on the appointment when it was first announced, the New York Times observed, "Judge Carswell is so totally lacking in professional distinction, so wholly unknown for cogent opinions or learned writings, that the appointment is a shock. It almost suggests an intention to reduce the significance of the Court by lowering the caliber of its membership."

In a recent column, Joseph Alsop said: "It was predictable, in fact, that if Judge Haynsworth should be beaten, President Nixon would find an even worse nominee . . . To all appearances, the President has found just that sort of man in Judge Carswell."

Two professors, William Van Alstyne of Duke Law School (who, incidentally, testified in support of Haynsworth) and Gary Orfield of Princeton's political science faculty, examined Judge Carswell's record and concluded his appointment was "an insult to the legacy of the Warren court."

Louis H. Pollak, Dean of Yale Law School, after studying Judge Carswell's legal opinions between 1965 and 1969, said he found "no signs of real professional distinction" in them and told the Judiciary Committee "I am compelled to conclude that this nominee presents more slender credentials than any nominee for the Supreme Court put forth in this century."

HIS LACK OF SENSITIVITY

The impression that emerges with great clarity from as much of Judge Carswell's record as is known is of a man insensitive to the great social issues of the day and indeed even hostile to them.

In 1958, when he was nominated as a Federal District judge, Senator Eastland demanded that he take an oath in effect never to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. Judge Carswell took such an oath, thus satisfying Senator Eastland and winning confirmation.

In the 1962 case involving the Pensacola School system, he went out of his way to insult the black children who brought the suit. They alleged, and the appellate court later upheld them in their plea, that they were suffering because the faculties of their schools were segregated. In an opinion that seems to mock their plight, Judge Carswell wrote, "Students can no more complain of injury to themselves of the selection or assignment of teachers than they can bring action to enjoin the assignment to the school of teachers who were too strict or too lenient."

In 1966, he and his wife sold a bayfront lot with a provision in the deed that it could be sold to white persons only. He did that, even though he was a U.S. District Court judge at the time and had been one for eight years; and even though the U.S. Supreme Court had outlawed such restrictive covenants and ruled they were unenforceable by the courts.

A number of women's groups have called attention to Judge Carswell's insensitivity to their problems, as expressed in a 1969 appellate court decision in which he voted to deny a rehearing to Ida Phillips, who lost her job solely because she was the mother of preschool children. (Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corp.). Testifying against the Carswell nomination, Rep. Patsy Mink (D., Hawaii) said that vote showed a "total lack of understanding of the concept of equality." On February 11, 1970, the Justice Department urged the Supreme Court to reverse the decision (endorsed by Judge Carswell) saying, it "will cause unwarranted hardship" to families with working mothers if permitted to stand.

Only a few months ago, in a speech to the Georgia Bar Association in Atlanta, he shocked some of the members by telling a racist joke: he said he asked "a dark-skinned person" "Are you from Indo-China?" and got the reply, "No suh. Ah's from Outdo' Georgia."

To stoop to that sort of cheap, minstrel-show humor in 1969 suggests Judge Carswell is oblivious to what has been happening in America during the last 20 years.

It seems that all of this suggests in countless numbers of ways that we are dealing with a nominee who simply does not possess the stature that would be required in ordinary times and certainly falls short in these times of racial crisis and division in our country.

So I commend my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. HARRINGTON), and I particularly commend the fine comments that have been made in this discussion by the gentleman from New York (Mr. LOWENSTEIN), and the comments made by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS), and many others who have felt constrained to make what I think is an important and perhaps, although we might not know it at this point, crucial contribution to the public evaluation turning on this question.

It is my hope, and I want to state now that it is my belief, that this nomination will ultimately be rejected by the U.S. Senate. If this does occur, I think the discussion here on the floor of the House of Representatives today will most certainly have had at least some small impact on what I hope will be this favorable result.

I now yield to my good friend and colleague from Indiana (Mr. JACOBS).

Mr. JACOBS. I wish to commend my colleague, also, for his contribution to the national enlightenment concerning this very important subject which is not just before the other body but is really before our entire country at this time.

I would also like to commend my colleague who has on numerous other occasions when it was even more difficult than on this occasion spoken out for decent and sensible priorities for our entire country.

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of California. Mr. Speaker, I should like to commend my distinguished colleague from Michigan, JOHN CONYERS, for his timely remarks concerning the confirmation of Judge Harrold Carswell and to associate myself with them.

I am opposed to the appointment of Judge Carswell to the Supreme Court. This is not a mere partisan opposition nor is it one prompted by regional prejudice or differences in political philosophy.

The overwhelming impediment to Judge Carswell's ability to serve on the Supreme Court is his repeated demonstration that he denies the self-evident truth—"that all men are created equal." The denial of so basic a tenet of our democracy must disqualify him in the eyes of all men who would preserve and defend the Constitution.

The Court and the Nation has been served over the years by liberals and by conservatives, by northerners and by southerners, by Republicans and by Democrats. This Nation has even endured and survived mediocrity in its public servants at various times in our history.

I oppose Judge Carswell's appointment by the President and urge the Senate to reject it not because of any of these considerations but, because to confirm him would be to confirm and approve of those things for which he stands.

To confirm Judge Carswell is to put the stamp of approval on a concept of racial superiority which is repugnant and contradicts all that our institutions have sought to uphold.

To confirm Judge Carswell is to return to the bitter days of the past and to hold back the natural surge of this Nation toward greater freedom for all of its people.

Judge Harrold Carswell should not sit on the highest court of this Nation.

Mrs. CHISHOLM. Mr. Speaker, there are only two aspects of the Carswell nomination with which I desire to concern myself.

The first is the obvious judicial ineptitude of the nominee. Even Judge Carswell's most enthusiastic supporters are forced to concede that ineptitude. Their only defense of supporting him is that others appointed to the Supreme Court have been just as inept.

It seems to be that this type of logic is both infantile and dangerous behavior. No responsible public official who is cognizant of the explosive racial situation in this Nation ought to, by his actions, indicate such total insensitivity to the problems which are, in essence, deteriorating the total American society.

The second aspect is the fact that Judge Carswell has, in my belief, demonstrated through his public and private actions that he was and is a racist. Therefore, I would be inclined to question the attitudes of those who support him.

FARM SUBSIDIES

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleague from Michigan and certainly endorse what he has said here today.

As the gentleman from Michigan knows—and my good friend from New York and others have joined me in the House on two separate occasions on this—we passed an amendment to the agriculture bill providing for a $20,000 subsidy ceiling that would save the taxpayers——

Mr. CONYERS. Is that a limitation?

Mr. CONTE. A limitation of $20,000 which would have saved the taxpayers over $300 million a year. Today we are fighting with everything we have for the bare necessities for this country in education, water pollution, and air pollution control projects. It certainly would be very helpful if we could have this limitation passed by both branches. It was unfortunately defeated in the Senate last time. I hope tomorrow when this RECORD is printed my colleagues will read this voluminous record beginning with some people receiving $4,370,000 a year not to plant crops when there are millions of Americans going hungry every night. This is really ridiculous, and I hope that the American public will rise in indignation when they see these statistics in the RECORD.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LOWENSTEIN. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CONYERS) on his statement today, and I want also to congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. CONTE) who has rendered a great service by bringing to the attention of this House this detailed record of the facts which everyone in the United States ought to know about so that we can legislate the end of this injustice and abuse of our resources.

I hope the fact that the gentleman has brought this to the attention of the Members will lead to a demand that the House again pass a ceiling on subsidies which we have twice before passed and that at this time there will be such public pressure that the Senate will concur and we will have a change in the agricultural support program.

I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include tabular material at this point in the RECORD.

DEVELOPING RURAL AMERICA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. PRICE) for 30 minutes.

Mr. PRICE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, last September President Nixon established a Task Force on Rural Development. The Task Force was charged with reviewing the effectiveness of present rural assistance programs. It was also given the responsibility for proposing means by which public and private resources could be focused on the problems of rural development.

Earlier this month, the final report of the Task Force was published. It represented the product of the intensive activities of 12 distinguished representatives of the private sector:

Mrs. Haven Smith, National Chairman. American Farm Bureau Women, Chappell. Nebr.

Dr. Joseph Ackerman, Managing Director Farm Foundation, Chicago, Ill.

Dr. C. E. Bishop, Vice President for Research and Public Service Programs, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, N.C.

Mr. William Erwin, Farm Manager, Etna Green, Ind.

Mr. Claude W. Gifford, Director, Editorial Page, Farm Journal, Philadelphia, Pa.

Dr. Roy M. Kottman, Dean, College of Agriculture and Home Economics, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. Clifford G. McIntire, Former Member of Congress, Perham, Maine.

Mr. True D. Morse, Business and Agricultural Consultant, Former Under Secretary of Agricultural Economic, University of Minnesota, St. Paul, Minnesota.

Dr. Emiel W. Owens, Visiting Professor of Agricultural Economics, University of Minnesota, St. Paul, Minnesota; On leave from Prairie View A&M College, Prairie View, Tex.

Mr. Al A. Schock, President, Nordica Foods Company, Inc., Sioux Falls, S. Dak.

Mr. P. Kenneth Shoemaker, Vice President for Governmental Relations, Heinz Company, Pittsburg, Pa.

Dr. Henry A. Wadsworth, Jr., Professor of Agriculture Economics, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Ind.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I would like to highlight some of the principal recommendations made by the Task Force:

The President and the Congress establish a permanent Commission on Rural Development with the responsibility to monitor rural development activity and report annually to the President and to the Congress with an evaluation.

Concerted effort should be put into rural development to give it the sense of urgency which the times demand.

The Task Force on Rural Development recommends that high priority be given to a national policy on the geographic distribution of population and economic growth.

New and revised programs should be designed to preserve and strengthen our decentralized system of government; make maximum use of private enterprise; and aim to solve problems rather than perpetually treat the symptoms.

Major emphasis should be placed on cooperation among and within all executive departments to get full use of the resources, energies and commitment of each department to rural development. Various departments and agencies can be designated with primary responsibilities in different subject matter areas.

Each State government should be encouraged to establish a top-level rural development council in the State executive branch; name a State coordinator of rural development; and designate a department, agency or organization within the State to have primary responsibility for coordinating State governmental activity for rural development in the State.

Simplification and streamlining of procedures for applying for rural development assistance. Catalogs of available rural development assistance programs should be maintained so that the designated local offices can give intelligent guidance to inquiries. There should be one place in each development area where preliminary applications can be made for State and Federal development assistance.

The Nation's industries should launch a campaign to establish jobs and new plant locations in countryside America.

Accelerated tax depreciation or investment tax credit for companies located in designated rural development areas should be explored.

Private industry should take on increased responsibilities in the job of training and retraining people in rural areas to develop their trade skills and ability to hold more productive employment.

Recommend a special effort by banks, financial institutions, and the Small Business Administration to lend money and provide management aids for small business in countryside America.

Urge the housing industry to develop special programs to provide better adapted, more economical housing for rural areas.

State departments of education should establish in multidistrict area vocational schools, programs of testing, occupational counseling, vocational and technical training; and in cooperation with the State employment services assist in job placement.

In government-aided manpower training, the Task Force on Rural Development recommends that cost-per-person as the yardstick for establishing training, should be minimized in rural areas.

Whenever practical, Government-aided manpower training be provided through incentives for on-job training in private industry.

The President requests the Interstate Commerce Commission to scrutinize all aspects of the rate structure of public carriers to serve the new national policies in rural growth and development.

The Federal Highway Act be amended to provide for a classification in the Federal-State highway system to be designated "rural development highways." These new short-mileage highways should lead to existing highways, thereby serving local areas that have a high development potential.

Annual funding for rural water and sewer facilities adequate to meet each year more of the soundly developed and approved applications received from rural communities.

The Task Force recommends accelerated annual appropriations to develop more small watersheds each year and to provide adequate funds to complete the projects within the estimated work schedule. We especially need to expand supplies of water for municipal and residential purposes and enhance recreation in nonmetropolitan areas.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated, these are but some of the Task Force's recommendations. While I do not concur with all of the suggestions of the Task Force, I do think they are all well worth analyzing and evaluating in depth. If some prove to be wanting, that in itself may lead those concerned to new more feasible recommendations.

On the whole, however, I think the Task Force has set forth a penetrating description of the urgent goals, policies, and priorities that must be considered if we hope to promote effective rural development.

Finally, for those of my colleagues who are so involved and intertwined with the problems of urban America that they fail to see the need for developing rural America, I say simply this. If the experts are right, and I have no reason to doubt their predictions, we will be a nation of urban centers by the turn of the century. If we continue on our present course, the urban problems that face us will be compounded. The result may be fatal to American way of life.

The experts also estimate that it would cost $100 billion a year over a 10-year period, simply to rebuild, remodel, and remove the urban cancers from our landscape. This, however, would still leave us a nation of city dwellers and I see this eventuality as a real social problem. I say this because recent studies indicate that a majority of those living in cities would prefer to live in the country if similar employment opportunities were available. In this regard, other studies have concluded that a substantial number of those who flee the country for the city do so for increased job opportunities, and that they would remain in the country if other things were equal.

As I stated in an earlier speech on the House floor:

> History will record whether our society truly attempted to provide meaningful and fulfilling life styles, patterns and opportunities for our people. Many critics state that to date, societies efforts have been largely unsuccessful ones.

I believe that if we dedicate ourselves as a nation and a people to the goal of rural development, and if we pursue this goal with unflagging dedication, I believe the resources of rural America can provide a rich bounty to ourselves and our posterity.

TWO NEW HIGHER EDUCATION BILLS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. QUIE) for 30 minutes.

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing two bills in the field of higher education. The first is the long-awaited administration bill, the "Higher Education Opportunity Act of 1970." Several of my colleagues join me in sponsoring this comprehensive bill in which the administration suggests many new and innovative approaches to Federal support for higher education. I shall comment on it in a minute.

I am also introducing a bill which would provide necessary general assistance to our institutions of higher learning, the "Higher Education General Assistance Act of 1970." It supplements the programs in the administration's bill and gives necessary balance to the total Federal package of higher education legislation.

Mr. Speaker, first let me explain some of the highlights of the "Higher Education Opportunity Act of 1970" which would go into effect July 1, 1971. It would establish a National Foundation for Higher Education with a board and Director appointed by the President. Modeled after the National Science Foundation, this new organization would be the Federal Government's main agency to support quality programs and to stimulate innovation and reform in institutions providing post-secondary education. It would be authorized at a level of $200 million its first year. The Foundation would have more flexibility than currently exists in Federal higher education programs to pinpoint needs and meet them with creative Federal initiative. The Foundation would be specifically authorized to fund, among other things, projects in public service education, community service, law school clinical experience, international education, language development, and networks for knowledge—repealing existing authorities for those programs, some of which have never been funded.

Although I have major questions about the Foundation which I will want to pursue in the Education and Labor Committee, I think the administration has suggested a bold, new mechanism for increasing our effectiveness in meeting specific needs in higher education.

Title II of the bill deals with library assistance. It focuses Federal funds on special needs for library assistance, repealing what we have come to know as basic and supplemental library grants. I, for one, believe this would be a mistake and therefore oppose repealing those parts of existing law.

Title III simply extends with technical improvements the very successful program to strengthen developing institutions.

Mr. Speaker, the major innovative feature of this bill is title IV which authorizes an entirely new approach to student financial assistance. This is a highly technical and complex section of the bill but a great improvement on the most part over present law. One which our colleagues will want to study carefully. Basically, the administration is proposing a way to make good on what so many of us have long advocated—the guarantee to a student from a low-income family that financial resources are available for him to pursue post-secondary education if he is qualified and so motivated.

Through the creation of a National Student Loan Association, similar in function to the Federal National Mortgage Association, colleges and universities, as well as financial lending institutions, would be able to warehouse or sell their student loan paper. Through this mechanism and Federal funds for direct grants to students, work study programs, and interest subsidies on certain loans, the Federal government could guarantee to a low-income student a financial assistance package sufficient to give him the same ability to pay for his education as a student from a family earning about $10,000 per year. Any student, regardless of family income, would be able to borrow at market rate up to $2,500 per year for his education. The Federal guarantee on these loans would result in an interest rate substantially lower than the student could otherwise get, if he could secure a loan at all.

Mr. Speaker, this section of the bill proposes a major breakthrough in providing enough funds to meet the demand and focusing those funds on students who need help the most.

I was disappointed to note that the administration would exclude students from vocational/technical and proprietary schools form the college work study program and the subsidized loans. This is a drastic step backward in our commitment to assisting students regardless of the type of postsecondary education they choose, so I will work hard to change this part of the bill.

Title V extends with technical improvements the many important programs which we have already authorized in the Education Professions Development Act.

Title VI of this new bill would limit Federal construction support to interest subsidies similar to title III of the Higher Education Facilities Act of 1963. Existing grant and direct loan authorities would be repealed. As I do not feel we can let up much longer in our assistance to institutions trying to keep pace with burgeoning enrollments, I will oppose the repeal of these programs.

Mr. Speaker, those of us who have fought to increase quality opportunities for our Nation's youth in vocational and technical education programs will welcome the administration's proposed career education programs in title VII of this bill. These programs will benefit especially our community colleges, but assistance in providing career education in critical skill areas will not be limited to these institutions. Indeed, many 4-year institutions will want to create new occupational training programs aimed at meeting critical skill manpower shortages as determined by the Secretary of Labor. The bill authorizes $100 million for the first year. Each State would receive $1,000,000 plus an allotment based on its total population. I commend the administration for its initiative in this important area and will work to develop this section in the best possible way.

Mr. Speaker, this bill deserves the careful attention of every Member and I can assure you we will study it carefully in the Education and Labor Committee. All of us on the committee have many questions we are anxious to pursue about some of the details of the bill. I have mentioned a few items which I believe to be mistakes and will make every effort to change them. But, overall, I think the administration has challenged us with some very thoughtful and well-conceived proposed programs.

I can appreciate the difficult decisions the administration had to make in sorting out its priorities for higher education legislation within the tight budget ceilings the President has proposed. We all sympathize with the administration's efforts to curb inflation. But the Congress must also participate in setting national priorities. While I applaud the initiative in the bill I have just discussed, especially its commitment to assist needy students, I do not feel there is adequate provision for assistance to the institutions of higher learning themselves.

I am therefore, Mr. Speaker, introducing a companion bill today, which I have developed myself, the "Higher Education General Assistance Act of 1970." This bill would provide general financial assistance to public and private nonprofit institutions of higher education.

We have discussed the idea of general institutional support for several years. Most of us have agreed that there would be a time when the Federal Government must share in the responsibility to support with unrestricted funds our colleges and universities. I believe that time has come. Is there any doubt that our colleges and universities are truly an indispensable national resource?

My bill will give balance to the comprehensive administration bill in providing solid Federal support to higher education. It would authorize grants to 4-year institutions based on the number of baccalaureate degrees granted. This approach rewards achievement; encourages efforts to save potential dropouts; is easy to administer. It does not offer assistance based on enrollment, thereby tempting institutions to accept large freshman classes without a firm commitment to see each student succeed.

The formula set forth in the bill would give more money per graduate for the first few hundred degrees than for greater numbers of degrees. This approach recognizes the economies of scale found in large institutions. It will not disadvantage the small institutions who need to hold down their tuition costs to remain competitive with the large, public institutions. But it will assist, in a most equitable way, all institutions.

For example, a 4-year institution which had 200 bachelor's degrees would receive $100,000 or $500 per degree. An institution with 2,500 bachelor's degrees would receive $620,000 or $248 per degree.

It is impossible to provide general assistance to community or junior colleges on the basis of degrees granted. The bill therefore provides that 15 percent of the total appropriation shall be distributed equally among community colleges based on the full-time equivalent enrollment in "regularly established degree, degree-credit, or certificate programs." The FTE figure would be the average of enrollment on the first day of class in November and May of each year. I believe this to be an equitable method of distribution.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is in concert with the concept of revenue sharing. The Congress would be recognizing the superior ability of institutions to determine their own most urgent needs. These general assistance grants would be an integral part of all the various Federal education programs. I believe it is time we seriously investigate this approach to financing our institutions of higher learning. They are in great financial need and we would be short-sighted indeed to neglect them at this crucial time.

I invite and welcome the help of my colleagues to study and improve the many provisions in these two far-reaching higher education bills.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN HIGH INTEREST RATES, INFLATION AND RESPONSIBLE MANAGEMENT OF THE ECONOMY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. BROWN) for 10 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, few issues facing the American people today have greater longterm import than inflation, its control and the return of our economy to a normal rate of growth.

Should we falter in our efforts to achieve wisdom in the management of the economy at this particular time of transition from inflationary pressures to healthy growth, we risk either resurgent inflation, with all of the consequent risks, or acute recession with all of the human suffering implicit therein.

Without doubt reasonable men may differ as to the mechanics and timing of this process, but there can be no valid difference of opinion on the imperative need for a return to healthy economic growth.

To that end, I wish to place in the RECORD my statement regarding today's hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee on the relationship between high interest rates, inflation, and responsible management of the economy. It is my plea for a renunciation of narrow political partisanship in the management of this very vital aspect of the "people's business".

My statement follows:

STATEMENT OF MR. BROWN OF MICHIGAN, HEARINGS OF BANKING AND CURRENCY COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS OPPOSING HIGH INTEREST RATES

Intelligent inquiry demands that we consider a problem within the context of axiomatic economic principles and facts. I regret that the tone of this hearing requires that they must be reiterated.

In a free economic system such as ours, interest rates respond to inflational pressures. When the value of the dollar is deteriorating rapidly, interest rates will inevitably rise to compensate for the erosion of value.

Inflation results from a cumulation of ill-advised economic policies which gather strength over a period of years.

Inflation will continue to make itself felt for significant periods of time after the forces which caused it have been brought into balance. Both economic and phychological reasons contribute to this time lag.

The techniques available to the President under present law for controlling inflation are largely restricted to fiscal management, i.e., reducing government expenditures which in turn reduces demand, increasing revenues which reduces consumer expenditures and and creating a surplus in the budget, which among other things reduces pressure on the credit market.

Each of these techniques has been used by President Nixon, despite great pressure from the opposition party, and frequently vocal opposition.

The single additional tool with which inflation can be challenged under present law is through restriction of the money supply by the Federal Reserve Board. This too has been done.

The alternatives to these policies include a number of highly distasteful controls intrinsically abhorrent to the American people. Application of such controls would have to be authorized by legislation which this or another Committee is free to report to the House any time the Majority Party which controls the Committees elect to do so.

Looking to the past, we must note:

1. At the time the Nixon Administration assumed office, inflation was at an annual rate just under 6%. For more than 2 years prior thereto, inflation had been mounting beyond the levels considered acceptable for stable growth.

2. In the 3 years ending June 30, 1968, previous administrations had incurred a total budgetary deficit on the order of $38 billion. Revenue measures recommended by Members of the Majority Party, responsible economic authorities, and leading Republicans had been flatly turned down by the Johnson Administration, and the budget continued in the red.

Today there are many signs indicating that the economy is coming under control.

There is evidence that the Federal Reserve Board is moving with wise caution to permit a normal expansion of the money supply.

Most of the major economic indicators reflect that inflationary pressures have softened.

Almost all economists of repute agree that we are in a period of transition which requires delicate handling. If we move too fast inflation will return with a vengence. If we move too slowly we risk recession. It is imperative that in discharging our responsibility as legislators that we cast aside narrow partisan goals in the interest of sound economic growth.

Most particularly, it is important that we be well informed as we act.

Thus it is strange indeed, assuming the sincere interest in the national welfare which each of us is entitled to as a presumption in any legislative action, that this hearing occurs at a time when the very thing the resolution under discussion calls for appears to be occurring as a result of natural market forces.

Interest rates are falling at an almost unprecedented rate, and under any test the future looks hopeful.

For the convenience of the members of the committee, I am appending an article from the Wall Street Journal for March 23, 1970—yesterday—discussing recent movement in interest rates.

The article states:

The downtrend in money market interest rates is alleviating the heavy pressure that has kept the nation's banking system from reducing the prime rate.

Rates have fallen sharply on three key sources of bank's funds: commercial paper, dollars and Federal funds.

For 2 weeks the rate for Federal funds has held at 7¾ percent or down from an average of 9 percent for the year, ranging as high as 12 percent.

For the week ending March 20, commercial paper was at 7¾ percent. Two weeks ago it was moving at 8¼ percent, and 6 weeks ago 9¼ percent.

Eurodollars, which for a year have traded at 10 percent or higher, have fallen below 9 percent in recent weeks.

Rarely has the Nation witnessed such rapid lowering of these significant indicators of the cost of money.

Appended also at the end of my statement are two clippings from today's newspapers.

The Washington Post reports on the financial page that interest rates on treasury bills fell this week to the lowest point in 9 months.

From the editorial page of the Wall Street Journal comes a discussion of the interrelationship between the shortage of real estate mortgage money, inflation, and monetary restraints.

Without reprinting it in the RECORD, I would refer interested Members to the lengthy discussion of the causes of inflation, interest rates, and the general state of the economy provided by Arthur F. Burns, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board for the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on March 18, 1970.

TREASURY BILL RATES HIT LOWS

Interest rates on the government's weekly offering of treasury bills declined yesterday to the lowest in more than nine months. Rates fell to 6.262 per cent for $1.8 billion of three-month bills and 6.183 per cent for $1.3 billion of six-month bills.

The short-term securities, last week at 6.836 per cent, were the lowest since the 6.191 per cent last June 2. The six-month bills declined from 6.707 per cent last week and were the lowest since last May 5, when they were 6.063 per cent.

INFLATED HOUSING

Monetary restraint, aiming at curing inflation, has clearly caused troubles for housing. There is reason to wonder, though, whether home building isn't suffering at least as much from the disease as from the cure.

Leif Olsen, senior vice president and economist of New York's First National City Bank, was considering that question in recent Senate committee testimony. Citing a Census Bureau report that residential construction costs rose 32.6% between 1964 and 1969, he said "this means that people, by and large, need to borrow more to acquire a house.

"What does this higher cost mean in terms of carrying charges? Well, if we take a $10,000 mortgage at 6½% the monthly charges are $54.17 or $19,500 over the lifetime of the 30-year mortgage. If the interest rate is raised to 8½%, the monthly cost jumps to $70.83 and $25,500 over the maturity of the mortgage."

That's a substantial jump, and that sort of thing surely has discouraged many people from buying homes. But higher home prices well may force the buyer to get a $15,000 mortgage, instead of one for $10,000. Even at a 6½% interest rate, Mr. Olsen noted, his monthly cost then would go to "$81.25, or $29,250 over the maturity. In other words, inflation in the price of a new home has in effect added more to the monthly costs than a jump in the mortgage rate from 6½% to 8½%."

Monetary restraint, moreover, is not the prime cause of higher interest rates; rates were rising many months before restraint began. As inflation eroded the value of money, lenders naturally insisted on a larger return.

Rates have continued to rise partly because it takes time to persuade lenders that inflation will be brought under control. The only hope for lower rates is responsible finance, not irresponsible inflation. In the process the rise in housing costs also should be slowed.

The Administration and Congress continue to press plans to help housing. Their efforts are more likely to be effective if everyone sees the real bricks and mortar of the industry's financial problems.

DECLINE IN MONEY-MARKET QUOTES EASES PRESSURE SUPPORTING RECORD PRIME RATE

(By Edward P. Foldessy)

NEW YORK.—The downtrend in money-market interest rates is alleviating the heavy pressure that has kept the nation's banking system from reducing the prime rate, the minimum fee on corporate loans.

Major banks have had a record 8½% prime rate since last June. A number of smaller banks reduced their rates beginning in February, but the big banks called the moves premature.

Principally, the money-center institutions argued that their own cost of obtaining lendable funds was too high in relation to the prime rate, and that loan demand, although off from the torrid pace of late 1969, was still a threatening factor.

In recent days, however, the cost picture has changed dramatically. Rates have fallen sharply on three key sources of banks' funds: Commercial paper, Eurodollars and Federal funds.

In two of these areas, rates have moved below the prime rate. For instance, Federal funds, the reserves that banks lend each other, usually overnight, have been at an average rate of about 7¾% for the past two weeks or so. For most of the year the rates have averaged around 9% and in some cases reached as high as 12%.

COMMERCIAL PAPER RATES

Commercial paper issued by bank affiliates currently is being sold at rates ranging from about 7¾% to 8¼%. Such issues, basically, are unsecured promissory notes; proceeds from the sales are used to buy loans from the portfolios of the affiliated banks. As recently as two weeks ago, the going rate on bank-related paper was about 8½%. Prior to then, the rates had ranged to as much as 9¼%.

Eurodollar rates, while still above the prime rate, have fallen dramatically. Eurodollars are dollars held outside the U.S. Banks in major U.S. money centers have relied heavily on such funds for their domestic needs. Recently, such funds have been trading at less than 9%, in contrast to the 10% and more rates common throughout most of last year.

Perhaps most significant for the commercial banks has been the rate reductions registered on commercial paper issued by financial and industrial corporations. Such paper is sold mainly to other companies and thus provides in essence a system whereby corporations borrow from each other, bypassing the banks.

The going rate on such paper dropped in about 7½% Friday after hovering above 8½% on active maturities until early this month. Bankers had been concerned that a reduction in the prime rate to below the prevailing commercial paper rates would cause corporations to switch their borrowings from the paper market to banks. Should paper rates remain at their current levels or fall further, banks would be given considerable leeway in setting the prime rate.

But banks may want to wait until at least the April 15 tax-payment date before taking action on the prime rate in order to get a better idea of loan demand.

The latest tax-payment date, last Monday, produced relatively heavy loan demand on banks, but according to bankers, created no real strains.

BANKERS' ACCEPTANCES

In money-market developments Friday, several dealers lowered their rates on bankers' acceptances by ⅛ percentage point.

These included M&T Discount Corp. and New York Hanseatic Corp. Both posted scales of 7½% bid, 7⅜% offered on acceptances due in one to 180 days. Bankers' acceptances primarily are bills to finance the export, import, transfer or storage of goods. They are termed accepted when a bank guarantees their payment at maturity.

One key benefit to banks of the general decline in interest rates is that it is allowing negotiable certificates of deposit to become competitive with other money-market instruments. CDs represent deposits left with banks for a specific period of time. Because banks aren't permitted to pay more than 6¼% to 7½% (depending on maturity), such CDs haven't been attractive to investors who could get higher rates on other money-market instruments.

While the CD ceiling rates are generally still below most other money market rates, banks in recent weeks have been able to find "buyers" for a moderate amount of certificates. Until the Federal Reserve clamped down tightly on credit, beginning late 1968, CDs had been a principal means banks used to obtain lendable funds.

TAKE PRIDE IN AMERICA

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MILLER) for 5 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today we should take note of America's great accomplishments and in so doing renew our faith and confidence in ourselves as individuals and as a nation. The United States is the largest producer of eggs in the world. In 1967, the United States produced 70,161 million eggs. This represented 26 percent of the world total and more than twice as much as produced by the Soviet Union, the second leading nation.

THE CRISIS GROWS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. DENT) for 30 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the House today to hear some bothersome facts about our impending import crisis, and the coming decision on international trade and its impact upon U.S. employment.

No nation was better prepared to sustain itself in every field of economic endeavor before and after World War II.

No nation will be in more serious jeopardy in this regard if trade is carried on for the next decade as it is now.

The total unemployment must be judged by the total of unearned income received as compared to the earned incomes from the production of goods and services.

We cannot count 24 million social security retirees, 13 million relief recipients, 9 million public paid civil servants as producers of goods for sale. To get a true picture of our impending crisis we must separate the production workers from the suppliers of services.

The producers are vulnerable to the flood of low price-structured imports, regardless of the foreign product U.S. selling price.

While the import flood usually starts by cutting into the U.S. market with a low selling price product, the price structure changes in proportion to the percentage of the U.S. market captured.

Witness the price, of imported electronic devices, televisions, radios, binoculars, watches, and the other more sophisticated consumer products.

As the cheap labor products invade our market, they push American producers to more automation and less and less quality products in an effort to meet the low prices set by importers. As our product quality is lowered, cheap labor producers overseas—and across our borders—better their quality and in slow but measured steps, the importer raises his prices.

By the time the U.S. producer gets set to compete with low margin profits depending upon mass production and sales, he has lost anywhere from 5 to 80 percent of his domestic market.

Once a U.S. product loses 5 percent of our market, the producer becomes more vulnerable and sensitive to new minimum wage standards, new union contracts, and even more serious, new taxes—local, State, and Federal—which are not applicable to producers of imported products.

American industry has pleaded in vain for years for protection against mandated production costs, not protection of their profit margins.

U.S. trade policy is dictated, unfortunately, by the will-o'-the-wisp of international diplomacy as practiced by our State Department.

Basically, our problems stem from two sources, one governmental, and the other economic.

The takeover of the Commerce Department's functions by the State Department is the one source of trouble, and the other is the high profit, with tax dodging avenues afforded, by import-export cartels, secret agreements, and just plain double bookkeeping practices here and abroad.

The old doctrinaire proforma arguments of the free traders are no longer valid. They only serve to lull Congress, our executive branch and, in general, the people, into a dream walking sleep, insensitive to the cries for help from the victimized industries and displaced workers.

The free trader's logic lost all of its value when the first U.S. runaway industry escaped its U.S. taxes, F.L.S. criteria, and strict accounting requirements on wages, hours, profits, and spending of corporation moneys by corporation officials. This happened when the U.S. producers moved to a foreign base of operations and exported to the U.S. market, not as a foreigner but as a U.S. trademarked domestic entity.

Universal condemnation of U.S. runaway industries is not valid in all cases. U.S. corporations are created for the single and sole purpose of earning profits for stockholders. Industry moves to the lowest waged area to protect profits. U.S. labor is organized, first, for the purpose of bettering wages, second, working conditions, and social conditions such as better housing, educational opportunities, health, and welfare.

Congress had its part in pushing U.S. industry to foreign shores, by making it profitable taxwise for industry to move offshore, and by allowing imports to take over—to the limit of their production capability—the U.S. marketplace.

Industry, in order to fulfill its purpose as a profitmaking institution, moves to any location that enhances its opportunities to make a profit.

Until Congress made it unlawful to ship products across State lines, unless produced under the conditions of the Fair Labor Standards Act, the South was taking industry away from the high-cost North.

In our industries tied to the minimum wage laws—textiles, and other high labor content products, secondary manufacturing, light industries, and import sensitive consumer lines—the lack of custom house or border protection is a death sentence, unless Congress ties import labor content to our standards under the Fair Labor Standards Act, Walsh-Healy Act, and Davis-Bacon Act, in the labor-management field, and antitrust price fixing, and monopoly in the consumer protection field.

Industry can claim with much justification that our trade policies are responsible for the growth of U.S. production overseas.

Labor has been a willing part too long in this mistaken, and outmoded trade policy.

Only recently has "big" labor started to "view with alarm" the impending crisis in imports. However, they are still taking two steps forward and falling back one and a half steps at the same time in trade policy.

The recent call to a session of labor leaders for a 2-day talk fest on imports was a masterpiece of walking uphill with a bucket of water on each shoulder over an egg paved walkway. They are so afraid of breaking the eggs, representing the free traders in the AFL–CIO, that they lose all the water, which represents the worry and fear of the unions with increasing unemployment from the impact of imports.

Until labor fights for a realistic trade policy based upon measuring import-export values on labor displacement both here and abroad, until labor demands that each industry be measured on its own and not as part of the all encompassing so-called balance of payments, and until labor realizes that nothing can substitute for a job there can be no meaningful, and equitable trade policy. Relief, subsidy, retraining, welfare, early pension plans, tax considerations, or any other handout can not take the place of the right to earn a living by working, and producing goods and services. The worker must have protection against foreign imports regardless of foreign product selling price in the U.S. market place.

So long as professionals and service workers believe they are immune from injury from imports, so long will the march into the imports crisis proceed.

Service industries will have to muster their forces to fight imports. They are tied to the domestic market. Production industries can move but professional and personal services must also live on the production, distribution and consumption of American goods.

Mr. Speaker, I present now a partial list of import penetration of U.S. market:

STEEL

In 1968 imports jumped to 18 million tons compared with 12 million tons in 1967. At the end of 1968 an international arrangement was made whereby other countries reduced their exports to this country to 14 million tons in 1969. This figure represented 13 percent of U.S. consumption. While exports doubled from 2.5 million tons in 1968 to 5.5 million tons in 1969, they were still only somewhat over a third of imports.

FOOTWEAR

In 1969 imports represented 23.9 percent of apparent domestic consumption.

In January 1970, imports reached about 33 percent of consumption.

SEWING MACHINES

In 1969 about 40 percent of our household sewing machines were imported. Only one company now manufactures in this country. A good part of the operation is assembling with imported goods.

AUTOMOBILES

Even though our automobile manufacturers have turned once more to small compact cars to meet import competition, they have been losing ground to imports.

In 1969 imports of non-Canadian foreign automobiles represented 12 percent of our domestic consumption in number of cars. Together with imports from Canada, imports were 18 percent of domestic consumption.

In January and February 1970, while U.S. production declined from January–February 1969 some 13 percent, imports increased 17 percent.

The increase in imports of automobiles is also reflected in steel tonnage.

TEXTILES

Woolen textiles imports began rising a few years ago and in 1969 supplied 26 percent of our market.

Manmade fibers reached a penetration of 9.4 percent in 1968. They have increased materially since then.

PIANOS

Imports in 1960–62 represented only 2 percent of our domestic consumption. In 1969 they had risen to 11 percent.

On a finding by the Tariff Commission the President in February of this year postponed the further lowering of the tariff as provided in the Kennedy Round.

TOMATOES

Florida tomato growers are being hard pressed by imports from Mexico.

During the 1968–69 season imports had grown to 38 percent of U.S. consumption. During the 1969–70 season imports have risen even more rapidly, because of some deficiency of the Florida crop.

In January and February of 1970 imports have supplied over half of U.S. consumption. During the first week in March 1970, imports equaled 86 percent of the market.

This means a low return for Florida because the higher prices associated with a short supply did not develop.

MUSHROOMS—CANNED

Imports of canned mushrooms are supplying about 30 percent of domestic consumption. The principal source is Taiwan.

FISH PRODUCTS

Over 50 percent of domestic fish consumption is supplied by imports. In some classifications the penetration ranges up to 65 percent and 70 percent. The uptrend has been sharp and relentless.

ELECTRONICS

Imports have worked great havoc in consumer electronic goods—household radio, television, record players, recorders, et cetera.

RADIO

In 1969 imports represented 78.5 percent of domestic consumption of table radios in this country; 94.1 percent of portable radios; 69.6 percent of clock radios, and 71.1 percent of all radios.

Nearly 20 percent of the imports were American brands manufactured abroad.

TELEVISION

In 1969 television imports reached 30.3 percent of the U.S. market.

PHONOGRAPHS

1969 imports of phonographs represented 32.6 percent of U.S. consumption.

HOME MAGNETIC TAPES

Imports reached 88.7 percent of the U.S. Market in 1969.

OFFICE MACHINES

TYPEWRITERS

Imports of portable typewriters represented about 80 percent of domestic consumption in 1969. Japan, Germany and Spain — Olivetti — were the principal sources. Office typewriters, including electric, achieved an import penetration of 38 percent in 1969.

CALCULATORS

Small electronic table model calculators reached 73 percent of U.S. consumption in 1969, most of them from Japan.

COMPUTERS

Imports of components have reached substantial proportions. Univac, for example, imports Japanese printed circuits for incorporation in the finished machines in this country.

TILE

Tile imports of all kinds—mosaic and wall—supplied 38 percent of apparent consumption in 1969.

In the case of glazed mosaic tile the penetration in 1969 was 97 percent, mostly from Japan.

BICYCLES AND BICYCLE TIRES

Bicycle imports have resumed their upward trend after subsiding for several years, reaching 28 percent of the market in 1969, up from 20.5 percent in 1968.

Bicycle tire imports have increased steadily in the past 10 years and now supply over half of domestic consumption. The 1969 penetration was 56.1 percent, up from 52.2 percent in 1968.

HANDBAGS

While import statistics are not easy to obtain, it is estimated that some 50 percent of domestic consumption is now supplied by imports.

SWEATERS

Imports of sweaters supplied 41.9 percent of our market in 1969.

UNFAIR TRADE POLICIES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GAYDOS) for 30 minutes.

Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, the handwriting is on the wall about the unfair fair-trade policies of our country. And, if you cannot read it there, you can read it with stark clarity in newspaper reports and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

We are facing serious economic problems because of the damage done by foreign imports to our glass, leather, textile and electronic industries. It may be only a matter of time until the steel industry again is threatened by foreign domination.

There have been confusing and conflicting reports published about the administration's position on this vital issue. I have seen articles which appear to put the President's advisors on both ends of the argument. Some claim the door should be opened wide to foreign products, thereby driving down domestic prices and curbing inflation. Others disagree, maintaining an open door policy will result in a flood of imports, an upward surge of unemployment ending in disaster for American industry.

There are reports the President is considering what appears to be a welfare program for industry in this country, one similar to his expanded, welfare plan for the individual. Under this industrial welfare program, the President would provide improved "adjustment assistance" to aid industries crippled by the blows from foreign competition. It could include subsidies during a crisis, unemployment and retraining benefits for displaced employees or development of new industries to replace outmoded ones.

There are many questions I have concerning this proposal, but I will hold them until more details have been made available to the Congress and the public.

As it stands now, I do not know, and I wonder if anyone does, just where the administration's position is on the import question. I wrote the President twice seeking an official answer if the administration is or is not considering liberalizing import quotas on steel. I finally received an answer, March 17, after a 2-month wait, but it was as confusing as previous reports. I still do not know what the administration is thinking.

William E. Timmons, Assistant to the President, informed me in his letter of March 13:

> The President has not made any decision to ask the foreign companies to modify that commitment (pertaining to the existing voluntary restraint program) and none of the President's advisors are not planning to submit the issue to him for decision in the immediate future . . .

Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I even understand that sentence. The first part would indicate the President has studied some plan but made no decision on his course of action. However, the second half of the sentence contains a double negative, "none—are not planning." Is that a grammatical error? If none are not planning, does it mean all are planning? At any rate, I conclude the advisers, at least, have been studying something.

Furthermore, Mr. Timmons continues in the same paragraph:

> However, I am sure you can recognize that the administration must examine the pros and cons of any measure in light of the over-all implication for the national interest.

This sounds to me as though Mr. Timmons is saying:

> If the question is not being studied now, it will be.

On the other hand, it could be an explanation why the administration now is studying both sides of the import coin.

Mr. Speaker, I feel the letter is vague, inconclusive and ambiguous. I do not believe it answers my specific question: Is the administration considering liberalization of foreign steel quotas?

I would like to submit into the RECORD copies of several newspaper articles which support my feeling the American Industrial market is facing serious problems with increased foreign imports. I hope my colleagues will read them. They have been clipped from the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, the Pittsburgh Press, and the Daily News of McKeesport.

On March 10 the Post-Gazette carried a story Zenith Radio Corp. expects to cut its working force by an average of 3,000 jobs in 1970 because of Japanese expansion in this industry—one which already has its share of troubles according to accounts reported previously in the RECORD. The article says this severe cutback in jobs is due to the opening of a new plant on Taiwan. An official of Zenith has written the Department of Commerce, warning the electronic industry here is "engaged in a life and death struggle with the Japanese."

I fear what the end might be if the current trend continues. Were I a cartoonist, I might depict a caricature of Uncle Sam, representing U.S. industry, committing hari-kari with a samuri sword, symbolic of our foreign import policies.

On March 12, both the Press and the Post-Gazette included stories dealing with a complaint filed by Westinghouse Electric Corp. with the U.S. Bureau of Customs. The firm is asking for an investigation into "unfair and unlawful" trade in power transformers, accusing companies in France, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Japan, and the United Kingdom of "dumping" their products on the U.S. market. Westinghouse states it has had to cut 346 persons from the payroll at its Muncie, Ind., plant because of the action of foreign competitors.

We have heard this sad song sung before in the House by other representatives of the electronic industry as well as those from glass, leather, and textiles.

Mr. Jack Markowitz, business editor for the Post-Gazette, says Westinghouse claims cheapie foreign goods are now grabbing 15 percent of the U.S. market and have cost American firms about $150 million in sales in the past 5 years. Furthermore, his story points out American firms cannot sell—at any price—their transformers in five of the six countries cited in the Westinghouse complaint.

The Markowitz article also points out how Japan plays the game of free trade. He warned on March 12—and formal requests were filed March 14—that five major aluminum firms in Japan were going to ask the Japanese Government to block establishment of an Alcoa smeltering plant on the Ryukyu Islands before this country returns that property to Japanese control.

It seems Japan wants no competition from Alcoa, nor from other American industries. An article from the Daily News of March 16 describes the battle for dollars now being waged between American and Japanese auto manufacturers.

Mr. Markowitz also touches on the matter of steel imports, noting the price of imported steel jumped from an average cost of $124 per ton in 1969 to $151 in January 1970. Why? Partly because of higher prices, he says, but also because foreign competitors began selling a higher percentage of higher priced steel, such as stainless, tool, and alloy.

The overseas producers changed their product mix, despite the fact they have said they would try not to. This paper promise was a provision of the voluntary restraint arrangement which was conceived to ward off congressional action on quotas after 1968's record import tonnage of 18 million tons of steel.

The amount of foreign steel coming into this country greatly concerns me because I represent a steelmaking section of this Nation—the 20th Congressional District of Pennsylvania. While steel may not now be feeling the crunch from foreign competition, due to record export tonnage, the industry is feeling the squeeze of a deflated economy and ballooning inflation.

Unemployment is on the rise throughout the country and there are indications domestic orders for steel now are easing off, which will mean manpower cutbacks since it is the practice of the industry to produce to meet demand. No orders—no work. No work—no need for workers.

The withdrawal of the Nation's involvement in Vietnam, while a most desirable turn of events, is, nonetheless, having its effect on the economic homefront in my district. In early March a shell-making plant employing 1,200 persons announced it will close June 1. Another plant, engaged in bomb production, has been cutting back its working force in recent months as the demand for the explosives slackened.

Steps are being taken to absorb these workers into other industries but it is a difficult process. The 20th District primarily is a steel district. There is not a great deal of diversification of industry. It is common knowledge at home that as steel goes, so goes the district's economy. The men furloughed now may have trouble getting work, but the situation will become extremely critical if the steel industry as a whole begins to cut back on its working force.

Mr. Speaker, the import question remains a serious one today. I realize there is no easy solution to a complicated problem. But, if the administration is considering a plan, I feel the Congress and the American public has a right to be so informed. I do not believe we should have to rely on unconfirmed newspaper articles quoting an unidentified source of information. Such a policy leads only to a nationwide guessing game.

The articles follow:

WESTINGHOUSE CHARGES "DUMPING"

By Jack Markowitz

Westinghouse Electric Corp. says competitors in six foreign countries are playing dirty in their U.S. sales of large power transformers, and the Pittsburgh firm yesterday asked the U.S. Bureau of Customs to do something about it.

Ironically, Uncle Sam is one of the leading customers at the foreigners' transoceanic discount counter where transformers are "dumped" for coveted U.S. dollars at prices under the fair value of the merchandise. Under what the foreign firms charge customers in their own countries.

Westinghouse says the cheapie foreign goods are now grabbing 15 percent of the U.S. market, and have cost American firms about $150 million in sales the past five years.

TAKES PROFITS, JOBS

John W. Simpson, president of Westinghouse Power Systems, said his firm has collected some hard evidence of dumped equipment from France, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Japan and the United Kingdom—and ironically, an American firm can't sell its transformers in five of those six countries at any price.

"They won't let you bid," said Simpson.

He indicated the unfair foreign competition is pushing the profits of Westinghouse—and probably the nine other U.S. firms that make big transformers—down to just about the break-even point on that equipment.

It also cost the jobs of 346 employes laid off during 1969 at Westinghouse's Munice, Ind., plant.

The big transformers—huge gray boxes as tall as 50 feet and priced between $50,000 and a few million dollars—are not made around Pittsburgh, so no local jobs are in danger . . . yet.

Transformers change the flow potential of electric currents, are vital at power plants.

But the same foreign firms that make them make other electrical gear that does compete with Pittsburgh, and any opening for dumpers is a mistake.

"An order you don't get is jobs you don't have," said John Simpson. "An injury might be just a lack of growth." He said Westinghouse's "profit erosion" in transformers hasn't been catastrophic. (The firm earned a record $149.8 million in 1969)—but "there is a principle involved."

The dumper typically loads all his development and engineering costs for a given product onto customers in his protected, own-country market, then makes use of excess plant capacity to ship goods here for an "incremental profit" that keeps his plant working and workers on the job. He frequently gets all kinds of export subsidy aid from his dollar-wanting government, too.

It leads to some crazy results.

The Japanese home prices on big power transformers (over 10,000 kilovolt-amperes) are three times higher, Westinghouse says, than prices they quote in the U.S.—with an ocean to cross, yet. Britain and Sweden sell here at about half price.

U.S. SEES NO EVIL

Uncle Sam, who puts on red-white-and-blue blinders when he opens bids, has been giving foreign transformer makers 95 percent of the current business in agencies like TVA.

A customs probe could lead to big duty charges being slapped on the dumped goods.

Sometimes just the threat of a probe will cause the foreign firms to cut it out.

As a couple of other recent evidences that foreign countries play free trade the funny way:

Japan's five major aluminum smelting firms are saying they'll try to block establishment of a possible aluminum smelter by Alcoa in the Ryukyu Islands, soon to revert to Japanese control. No competition from Alcoa, please, for Asian market.

American Iron and Steel Institute reports the value of an average ton of imported steel went up sharply in January to $151 from $124 during 1969. This partly reflects higher prices but partly, too, the increasing percentage of higher priced steels—stainless, tool and alloy. These grades amounted to 5.9 per cent of January imports versus 4.3 per cent in December.

Foreign steelmakers agreed to a "voluntary" quota on U.S. sales in terms of tonnage. Nobody promised anything on dollars.

[From the Pittsburgh Press, Mar. 12, 1970]

WE FILES DUMPINGS CHARGES

Westinghouse Electric Corp. has asked the Customs Bureau to investigate what it termed "unfair and unlawful" trade in power transformers.

It cited firms in France, Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, Japan and the United Kingdom.

Westinghouse has attempted to purchase large electrical equipment firms in the Common Market recently without success.

In its complaint, Westinghouse claimed that it has reduced employment by 346 persons at its Muncie, Ind., plant "as the result of . . . dumping."

"Dumping" under the treaties is when a firm charges less for a product in a foreign market than it charges in its domestic market.

JAPAN PUSH CUTS ZENITH IN U.S. JOBS

WASHINGTON, March 9.—Zenith Radio Corp. expects to reduce its U.S. work force by "an average of 3,000 jobs in 1970 against 1969," Chairman Joseph S. Wright said in a letter to U.S. Commerce Secretary Stans.

Next year, Maurice Wright wrote, opening of a new plant in Taiwan will generate 4,000 jobs "which will probably be lost in this country." The Chicago-based company had an average 23,000 workers in 1968.

"The most tragic part of this story is that the heaviest impact of our 3,000 lost jobs this year is on blacks we have worked to train and give . . . The economic ability to escape the ghetto," the letter said, specifying that according to seniority "38 percent of those laid off are blacks."

The letter described the electronics industry as "engaged in a life and death struggle with the Japanese."

JAPANESE TRY TO KEEP OUT U.S. AUTO FIRMS

TOKYO.—Japan and the United States are fighting for auto dollars as fiercely as they fought for land 30 years ago.

Armed with money and technology, Detroit is battling to establish fixed investment beachheads in Japan. Japanese automakers are trying to contain General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

The stakes are high. Last year Japan built 4,198,429 vehicles, second largest volume in the noncommunist world. While 420,000 of Japan's little cars rolled onto the U.S. market, Detroit sold only a few in Japan.

Nevertheless, Tokyo is awed by Detroit's seemingly unlimited access to investment capital, its efficiency and its expensive research programs. Japan knows such a force eventually will penetrate her market. So she is fighting a rear guard action, hoping to delay and shape the inevitable.

BARRIERS FALLING

Japan's regulations on foreign investments have kept Detroit from buying up Japanese car makers as it has done in Europe. But the door is opening under diplomatic and financial pressures. A booming Tokyo finds it increasingly difficult to justify protectionist policies established in the immediate post-war years to get the country back on its feet. So, in the autumn of 1971, American companies will be free to establish joint ventures with Japanese firms. But it will be limited to a 50-50 basis.

U.S. companies, pointing to the growing number of foreign held firms in the United States, are demanding the same privileges.

Japan's two largest auto producers, Toyota and Nissan (Datsun), say they intend to stay under Japanese control even if unlimited American capital is permitted in Japan. Toyota manufactured 1,714,786 vehicles last year; Nissan 1,026,712.

Both are working closely with government economists to cut production costs and surplus employes.

Smaller Japanese auto producers are not so skittish about U.S. investment. Mitsubishi, the No. 4 automaker, recently signed an agreement with Chrysler for a production center in Japan. Chrysler presently has only 35 per cent control but hopes to increase that share in 1971.

Ford is exploring a tie-up with Toyo Kogyo, developer of the rotary engine. So far, Toyo Kogyo has limited Ford's participation to 7 per cent of the stock.

On the surface, Japan's auto industry looks fat and healthy. And it is projecting 5 million cars and trucks this year.

But both Tokyo and Detroit know that continued growth depends on finding new markets, and both have virtually saturated their home markets.

FOREIGN TRADE CONTROLS BECOME MAJOR ISSUE AGAIN

(By Don McLeod)

WASHINGTON.—International trade regulation, the oldest continuous issue in American politics, once again is raising a fight, this time in tandem with another ancient but immediate problem—inflation.

As hearings approach on President Nixon's proposed Trade Act, the administration is arguing that the high cost of living is a prime cause of import problems and a sure result of higher trade barriers.

Hobbling U.S. import trade, a State Department official recently declared, "would raise costs and prices at home, adding to a difficult domestic problem."

At the same time Southern congressmen were asking for salvation from Japanese textile competition, and organized labor, traditional champion of free trade, was flirting with protectionists.

The Industrial Union Department of the AFL–CIO has called an unprecedented conference in Washington March 19–20 on what it calls the developing crisis in international trade.

"Large numbers of American workers are sensing an increasing concern about the potential—or the actuality—of unemployment caused by foreign imports to the United States," IUD said.

Indeed, the argument goes, inflation is a principal cause of import excesses, since rising prices of domestic products make cheaper foreign goods more attractive. Raising tariffs or imposing quotas, say the advocates of free trade, would only serve to support inflation prices.

This philosophical overview is cold comfort to stockholders and employes of businesses facing import competition.

Textile imports from Japan, Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong are hurting U.S. mills in the Southeast. Footwear from Italy and Spain is squeezing Yankee enterprise in New England. Japanese electronics is the other big invader.

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers claim that textile imports have wiped out 200,000 American jobs. This is the kind of thing which is turning unions from their preoccupation with consumer prices.

"These claims come oddly at a time when employment and business activity have been at record highs," said Trezise.

In support of Nixon's liberal proposals, Trezise points to 25 years of unparallelled prosperity under such policies. The protectionists counter that times are changing; that American products are becoming increasingly noncompetitive on the world market.

"Even if this were true," Trezise answers, "it is not clear how we would improve the situation if we cut back on imports, thereby raising costs and prices still more at home and causing other countries to retaliate against our exports."

Free traders feel the problem can be solved by better means than tariffs or quotas.

Nixon's bill would improve the "adjustment assistance" program of aid to industries disrupted by foreign competition. This may include subsidies during a crisis, unemployment and retraining benefits for displaced employes, or development of new industries to replace inefficient ones.

"This is the route we think is the economically sensible one," said one administration official. "The best way is to help develop new industry and new jobs."

This official says the United States should concentrate on the more advanced industries, leaving those dependent on cheap labor to the less developed nations.

The administration is arming for a fight because it fears there will be a massive effort to add protectionist amendments to the Nixon bill.

Only a few particularly distressed industries are clamoring for relief now, but historically once the question is opened in Congress the logrolling gets out of hand.

Regulation of foreign trade has been a problem for this country from the beginning and was, in fact, a major reason for its birth as a nation. Oppression of freedom in Boston may have led Patrick Henry to call for rebellion, but it was Boston merchants' resistance to British trade restraints that converted rhetoric into action.

Not allowed to develop manufacturing under colonial rule, the United States was careful to protect its infant industry after independence. In 1789, the year George Washington became president, Congress passed the first customs bill—with tonnage duties favoring American shipping.

John C. Calhoun, guessing that the South would develop manufacturing because of its ready cotton and water power was a sponsor of the nation's first protective tariff in 1816. But Calhoun was wrong. All the benefits went to the North, where manufacturing flourished, while the economy of Calhoun's agrarian South Carolina declined.

In 1832, South Carolina declared a new tariff bill "null and void," and only President Andrew Jackson's strong hand saved the Union.

Congress rolled back the duties, and there the issue rested until 1860, when the Republican platform called for another protective tariff.

The Republicans won, the South left the Union—the new Confederate constitution forbade protective tariffs—and the GOP passed the first high tariff act in 29 years.

Protection brought pretty much what its proponents wanted and its opponents predicted. Prices rose 117 per cent from 1860 to 1865 while wages increased only 43 per cent.

High tariff remained U.S. policy for half a century until it was revoked briefly under Democrat Woodrow Wilson in the Underwood tariff of 1913.

But the Underwood tariff never really had a chance to survive. The war in Europe sheltered American industry and fostered new manufacturers, which demanded protection to keep them alive after the peace.

Shortly after becoming president, Warren G. Harding declared "the urgency for an instant tariff revision cannot be too much emphasized." Congress obliged with an emergency tariff which brought farmers into the protection fold, and the Fordney-McCumber tariff act of 1922 with record high rates.

The farmers gained nothing. Foreign nations retaliated with tariffs of their own. Monopolies thrived. And prices outstripped wages.

But perhaps the most devastating result was that the high tariffs made it extremely difficult for European nations to pay their war debts, thus encouraging the debt-reparations cycle that contributed to World War II.

With the Great Depression impending and farmers in distress, Herbert Hoover called Congress into special session in 1929 to help them through "limited changes in the tariff."

What followed was logrolling at its worst. Out of more than 1,000 tariff increases proposed in the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930, only 75 were on farm products.

Rates were upped from 33 to 40 percent. Within two years 25 countries established retaliatory tariffs. In 1929 the United States enjoyed 13.8 percent of the world's foreign trade. By 1933 it had fallen to 9.9 percent. And the domestic economy, far from being helped, continued to plummet.

This crisis brought about a new view of world trade. Primarily the work of New Deal Secretary of State Cordell Hull, it is still U.S. policy.

On March 2, 1934, President Franklin D. Roosevelt asked Congress for permission "to enter into executive commercial agreements with foreign nations." Pointing out that world trade had declined 70 percent since 1929, Roosevelt proposed to reduce tariffs and ease restrictions through mutual concessions negotiated between nations. This was "reciprocity."

The Cordell Hull Trade Agreement Act was signed June 12, 1934, and Hull quickly negotiated reciprocity treaties with 25 countries. Within a year trade with Cuba doubled and improved substantially with Canada, Latin America and some European nations.

Since 1934 reciprocity has been supported by both Democratic and Republican administrations. The old alignments over tariff issues dissolved as expanding industries sought world markets and the South developed manufactures.

In 1949 more than 40 nations met in Geneva and agreed to sweeping tariff reductions. The United States cut duties on thousands of items and led in establishing the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade to promote expansion of world trade.

The last extension of the reciprocal trade legislation was in 1962, when the United States lowered rates on nearly 6,000 items and other countries made comparable concessions.

The extension ran out in 1967. The lapse does not invalidate existing agreements but cramps the government in making even minor adjustments.

While the principle of reciprocity remains pretty well established, the thrust of protectionists now is to impose quotas on offending imports.

"The administration is against quotas," one spokesman said, "but does recognize that some imports are increasing too rapidly."

Talks to negotiate bilateral restraints have been going on for some time and an agreement was signed with Poland last month on textiles.

However, other talks, notably those with Japan, are dragging on, and the administration concedes that "Congress is beginning to lose patience."

SHULTZ, SENATOR MUSKIE SEEK FOREIGN TRADE ANSWERS

By Milton Jaques

WASHINGTON, March 22.—Congress and the Nixon Administration may soon turn their attention to the problems of world trade and U.S. unemployment.

Labor Secretary George P. Shultz, busy enough trying to work out solutions to rail and mail puzzles, said this weekend something has to be done to assist working people hurt by foreign trade.

Senator EDMUND S. MUSKIE, D–Me., on the same subject told an AFL–CIO conference on the developing crisis in international trade that the U.S. should encourage fair labor standards around the world.

CONCERN GROWS

Both positions reflect the growing concern with the problem of imports which hurt and exports which help the American economy.

Shultz acknowledged that help for jobless workers under the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 just aren't satisfactory.

Until the U.S. Tariff Commission last fall in a landmark decision found that about 450 steelworkers in the Pittsburgh area lost their jobs through imports coming on top of trade concessions, the commission hadn't granted a single application for relief.

The workers at Armco and U.S. Steel's closed plants were certified as eligible for special unemployment benefits, a program Shultz's department is supervising.

Both Congress and the Administration at this point seem ready to do what they can to keep international trade channels open without increasing unemployment in this high-wage nation.

Shultz says the Administration will act, even before Congress does, to ease the stress through a Labor Department warning system devised to watch industries most likely to be affected by imports.

ONLY STOPGAP

Shultz isn't knocking the unemployment compensation program, but he looks at it as a stopgap measure until workers are given a wider range of training for new jobs.

The secretary also wants to involve those American industries which benefit through foreign trade in the effort to help the displaced.

Congress always likes a middle ground approach to difficult problems, and in this instance may want to get something which will prevent a return to high tariff barriers which could stifle all overseas trade.

Sen. Muskie thinks the U.S. should do something to encourage fair labor standards elsewhere, as one step which could protect U.S. workers from the threat of goods produced under sweatshop conditions.

Within the labor movement, the mood is still hopeful that a middle ground can be reached, somewhere between economic isolationism and absolute free trade, according to President I. W. Abel of the United Steel Workers of America.

OIL IMPORT RESTRICTIONS RETAINED BY PRESIDENT REQUIRE CONGRESSIONAL SCRUTINY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HAMILTON) for 10 minutes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, on March 18, 48 Members advised the President of their disappointment with his failure to implement the recommendations of his Cabinet task force on oil import control.

Last year American consumers paid an extra $5 billion for oil products due to present restrictions on oil imports. The oil import quota system cost the average American family of four an extra $96 last year for gasoline and heating oil.

I direct the attention of my colleagues to the letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 18, 1970.

The PRESIDENT, The White House, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We are disappointed by your failure to implement the recommendations of your Cabinet Task Force on Oil Import Control. The present restrictions on oil imports, which will remain unchanged unless you act, forced American consumers to pay an extra $5 billion for oil products last year. The annual cost to consumers will rise to $8.4 billion per year by 1980 unless changes are made.

Last year alone, the oil import quota system cost the average American family of four an extra $96 for gasoline and heating oil. In many parts of the country the extra cost greatly exceeded this—in Vermont the average family of four paid an extra $180, and in Wyoming it paid $228 extra.

We can understand your concern for the well-being of the oil industry. However, it is the security of the nation, and not that of the oil industry, that the oil import control program is intended to protect. As your Cabinet Task Force put it:

"The governing statute authorizes government intervention in support of domestic price and production only for the extraordinary and compelling purpose of protecting the national security."

The Task Force then went on to state that the fixed quota limitations, which you are retaining, "bear no reasonable relation to current requirements for protection either of the national economy or of essential oil consumption.

"We find," the Task Force said, "that a phased-in liberalization of import controls would not so injure the domestic industry as to weaken the national economy to the extent of impairing our national security."

The Task Force then recommended that the current import quota system be phased out over a period of three to five years, and that a system of variable tariffs be substituted for it. The initial tariff on Eastern Hemisphere crude oil would be $1.45 a barrel, with a ceiling (10 percent of domestic demand) on oil from that region. Oil from more secure Western Hemisphere sources would be subject to preferential lower tariffs. The immediate effect of the plan would be a reduction in the price of domestic crude oil from $3.30 to $3.00 per barrel, with savings to consumers estimated at less than a penny per gallon of gasoline.

This is truly a modest proposal, since revolving import controls entirely would save consumers around 4 cents a gallon on gasoline. But it is a step in the right direction and we regret that you have declined to take it.

A necessary further step has been recommended by the Chairman of the Task Force, Labor Secretary George P. Shultz. He has urged that a planning schedule be established now to phase in a reduction of the tariff to $1.00 over a three to five year period. This would reduce the price the consumer has to pay for gasoline by another one cent per gallon.

Finally, we are concerned that the Cabinet Task Force may have dismissed the alternative of total removal of all import controls too hastily. The benefit to American consumers from this alternative—more than $8 billion a year by 1980—requires that it receive careful and continuing consideration. The Task Force said only that it was "unable on present evidence to rule out the possibility" that adopting this alternative would, in the case of certain "conceivable" supply interruptions, leave us with an inadequate supply of oil. "Whether such conceivable interruptions are "reasonably possible," the Task Force said, "is a matter on which judgments may vary."

We urge you, therefore, to direct the Oil Policy Committee which you have established to give full consideration to the possibility of totally eliminating controls on oil imports as part of their task of considering "both interim and long-term adjustments that will increase the effectiveness and enhance the equity of the oil import program."

Sincerely,

SUPREME COURT MUST CLARIFY NATION'S LAWS ON PRESERVING NEIGHBORHOOD SCHOOL SYSTEMS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PUCINSKI) for 30 minutes.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, on March 9 of this year, Chief Justice Burger announced in a concurring opinion in Northcross against Board of Education of the City of Memphis that he thought it was time the Court clearly decided the outstanding issues which have divided many lower courts in handling school desegregation cases. He said:

> The time has come to clear up what seems to be a confusion . . . concerning this Court's prior mandates.

Continuing, he said:

> We ought to resolve some of the basic practical problems when they are appropriately presented including whether, as a constitutional matter, any particular racial balance must be achieved in the schools; to what extent school districts and zones may or must be altered as a constitutional matter; to what extent transportation may or must be provided to achieve the ends sought by prior holdings of the Court.

Judge Burger's words take on special meaning today in the wake of President Nixon's excellent statement on school desegregation. This Nation desperately needs to clarify the distinction between de facto and de jure segregation. This nation desperately needs a reaffirmation of constitutional law regarding preservation of neighborhood schools.

President Nixon quite properly stated:

> Several recent decisions by lower courts have raised widespread fears that the nation might face a massive disruption of public education: that wholesale compulsory busing may be ordered and the neighborhood school virtually doomed. A comprehensive review of school desegregation cases indicates that these latter are untypical decisions, and that the prevailing trend of judicial opinion is by no means so extreme.

The President himself notes the confusion that prevails throughout the nation because of varying Court decisions.

Respectfully, Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Subcommittee on general education, I must say that it seems about time that the Court resolve these matters. One of the Court's criteria in reviewing the constitutionality of legislation is that it must be clear and precise; if it is vague, it will be voided. Legislation may not leave people in doubt as to whether it applies to them or to their contemplated conduct; it may not stand if it leaves too much discretion of application to the police, administrative officials, juries, or judges. That is a sound doctrine.

And yet it is a doctrine which the Court has not applied to its own rulings. What, for example, must a school system do to bring itself in compliance with the mandate of Brown against Board of Education?

In Alexander v. Holmes County Board of Education, 396 U.S. 19, 20 (1969), the Court told us that a unitary school system, a system in compliance with the Brown case, is one "within which no person is to be effectively excluded from any school because of race or color." Fine. The question is then whether the admitting officers are discriminating. Well, apparently not quite, because in Green v. School Board of New Kent County, 391 U.S. 430, 442 (1968), the Court said a unitary system is a "system without a 'white' school and a 'Negro' school, but just schools."

Well, if it means that it is not permissible for school officials to designate a school as serving only Negroes and another school as serving only whites and to attempt to route pupils of each race to their respective schools, that complies in theory with what is said in Alexander.

But in Adams v. Matthews, 403 F. 2d 181, 188 (C.A. 5, 1968), one court apparently read that sentence differently, because it laid down this test for a unitary system:

> If in a school district there are still all-Negro schools or only a small fraction of Negroes enrolled in white schools, or no substantial integration of faculties and school activities, then, as a matter of law, the existing plan fails to meet constitutional standards as established in Green.

What if there are all-Negro schools in a system and this is because of residential patterns; that is, Negroes are concentrated in a particular area, the center city, for example, and the nearest school serves that area. It is all-black, but it was established there long before the residential area was so predominantly Negro. It is a true case of de facto segregation. "As a matter of law," is that to be considered a system not in compliance with Brown and Green?

A panel of the fifth circuit on February 17, in Ellis against Board of Public Instruction of Orange County, Fla., No. 29124, said no. The court found that the all-Negro schools resulted from living patterns and a nondiscriminatory adherence to the neighborhood school system.

A district court in Charlotte, N.C., however, went the other way. Swann against Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education, CA No. 1974. Negroes were concentrated in the inner city, whites in the suburbs. The schools reflected the living patterns. It has to be changed, said the judge, and imposed an iron-clad rule that the school board must so arrange its school attendance so that in every school the pupil ratio reflected the pupil ratio in the entire system. Every school must have a ratio of 79 percent white, 21 percent Negro, and this will mean busing at least 10,000 extra children around the city and county every day. Other courts have established ratios in South Carolina and Georgia and elsewhere. It is a far cry from requiring a system "within which no person is to be effectively excluded from any school because of race or color."

Last week the Supreme Court further confused the situation by refusing to order immediate implementation of this lower court ruling. But this action was contained in a one-sentence denial of motion with no opinion added. Does this mean that the Orange County case is the law? If so, the Court owes the country an obligation to make that clear.

Furthermore, as regards faculty desegregation the same confusion exists. In United States v. Montgomery County Board of Education, 395 U.S. 225 (1969), the Court found it to be within the discretion of a district judge in dealing with a recalcitrant school board to set a faculty ratio which the board must observe. The Court approved it only after reciting all the difficulties the judge had had; it did not say that all courts must establish similar ratios. Yet since then a constant feature of every order issued by the district courts has been the setting of a faculty ratio.

The Court should clarify this issue of ratios, both pupil and faculty. It should spell out what it means by desegregation and what it conceives a unitary system to be. It should spell out the constitutional duties of school boards, North and South, with regard to de facto segregation and residential patterns.

It has generally been thought that de facto segregation created no constitutional problems. Yet a State court in Los Angeles and Federal courts in Pasadena and in Flint, Mich., have divined de jure violations in school board maintenance of neighborhood schools knowing that residential segregation existed. The Court must make clear what the 14th amendment commands.

The Court must speak on the requirements the lower courts are placing upon school boards in order to overcome de jure segregation. Not only busing is at issue here. The lower courts have said that zone lines must be drawn, new construction planned, additions made, all in the conscious intent to promote integration, whatever the cause of the segregation. United States v. Greenwood Municipal Separate School District, 406 F. 2d 1086, 1093 (CA 5, 1969); Brewer v. School Board of City of Norfolk, 397 F. 2d 37 (CA 4, 1968).

There are important questions to be resolved and the Court must soon resolve them or leave our Nation's school system in total disarray.

Our entire school system is seriously threatened throughout the Nation because even well meaning school administrators don't know exactly what is expected of them in the wake of the many judicial decisions being handed down by different courts in the wake of the Brown decision.

I am certain the American people want to preserve at all cost the neighborhood concept of their public schools.

I have no doubt the people would ratify a constitutional amendment—if such action is their only alternative—to preserve their neighborhood schools.

That's why I believe it is of the highest urgency for the Supreme Court to hand down a clear and concise ruling on this entire question. The American people cannot take my action until we know which direction the Supreme Court will go on this entire question of school desegregation. I personally hope the court will sustain the neighborhood school concept. If it does, we can then get down to the serious business of giving all of our children a decent education so they can more readily meet the challenge of the 21st century.

One thing is certain. As chairman of the subcommittee that now has before it a great deal of legislation dealing with the future school needs of this country, it is quite apparent to me that school superintendents all over America are bewildered and befuddled. They have no idea in which direction the local courts will go in this whole problem, and until the Supreme Court takes on the responsibility of setting down a decision on de facto and de jure segregation and all the other problems that I mentioned in my remarks, the confusion will continue to prevail and school boards will not be in a position to intelligently look down range and work out an effective program of providing meaningful education to all children, regardless of their race, their creed, their origin, or their religion.

So it is my hope that the Court will recognize the turmoil that now exists throughout the country and address itself to this problem. We are all encouraged by the statement of Chief Justice Burger. We hope the President's message will stimulate further thought in that direction.

THE COST OF CONVENIENCE

(Mr. PODELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. PODELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Federal Trade Commission for their recent initiative toward eliminating the mailing of unsolicited credit cards. I have long held this practice to be a source of annoyance and even financial trouble for many consumers.

Unfortunately, however, well intentioned the Commission's action, the proposed trade rule does not go far enough to assure the consumer of the safeguards to which he is entitled. The very action of the FTC has raised several very deep conflicts which only the Congress can resolve. I call upon my colleagues now to speedily seek a legislative solution to the twin problems of jurisdictional definition and the public interest.

The Commission is not to be faulted for the omissions of its trade regulation. It is the responsibility of the Congress to make good where the FTC cannot. I am proud to have introduced in the last session of Congress, legislation specifically designed to remedy both problems.

The strength of the Commission's statement underscores the immediacy of the problem of unsolicited credit cards. As I see it, there are at least two major aspects to the problem. The first is that the receipt of a credit card by a less prudent consumer may well tempt him into overextending his credit. There will be more than 200,000 consumer bankruptcies in 1970. It is generally conceded that there is a direct correlation between the rate of consumer bankruptcies and the mailing of unsolicited credit cards. The protection of the consumer, the soundness of our banks, and the health of the economy all militate against the mass-mailing of credit cards.

Second, it is a sad fact that the consumer has no national safeguard against the unauthorized use of his cards. If his cards are lost or stolen, he may find himself hopelessly in debt by the time his monthly statement reaches him—all for purchases he did not make. To correct this injustice, it is my proposal that we limit the cardholder's liability for unauthorized purchases to $50. In addition, I would recommend that unless certain qualifications are met, among them the holder signing the card and the issuer providing a means of identifying the user, the cardholder assume no liability.

Turning to the problem of jurisdictional conflict, we find that the FTC, by its own admission, does not have the requisite jurisdiction to ban the practice of mailing unsolicited credit cards in all areas of competition. Hence, the most potent sources of credit cards are excluded—banks, common carriers, and airlines.

This raises the question that perhaps the FTC is not the proper body for the safeguarding of the consumer in this most vital area. I would suggest, rather, that the Congress enact legislation designed to empower the Federal Reserve Board to prescribe regulations with respect to unsolicited credit cards.

The Board is particularly well suited for this function. The precedent and power for such an act are grounded in the Truth and Lending Act. More importantly, the Board already possesses real economic sanctions—direct and indirect—which may be brought to bear against potential violators. Its range of powers would be enough to secure immediate compliance.

By enacting this proposal, we would empower the Federal Reserve Board to do what the FTC cannot and thereby bring under regulation all banks, as well as all other issuers.

At a time when spiraling inflation is recognized as the major domestic crisis, it is appropriate that we consider the cost of credit as well as its convenience. It is appalling to me that many of our great financial and commercial institutions have seemingly been engulfed by a case of massive myopia in their credit practices. The extension of credit is now being accomplished at a rate of 18 percent annually in interest charges. This rate is economically regressive. Those who need credit for the purchase of essentials, such as homes, are often driven out of the market. In short, the indiscriminate extension of credit without regard to the credit worthiness of potential cardholders can be regarded as an important contributor to the continuing trend of inflation.

The Federal Trade Commission is to be commended for taking the first steps toward halting the indiscriminate distribution of unsolicited credit cards. That the FTC's action must be of a limited nature cannot be held to be the Commission's fault. The shortcomings of that initiative have made clear the need for legislation. The American consumer can wait no longer. Many of the 1.5 million Americans whose cards shall be lost or stolen this year will find themselves liable for bills charged to a card which they neither desired, requested, nor received.

Excursions into debt, consumer bankruptcies, criminal tampering with the mails, and ever-spiraling inflation are all abetted by credit card abuse. It is my great hope that the Congress will see its responsibility, as I do, and enact this much needed legislation.

A DISAPPOINTING DECISION

(Mr. PODELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. PODELL. Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were greeted with an announcement by Secretary of State William Rogers stating that the United States would not be selling any airplanes to Israel at this time. The official declaration did not come as a surprise. Indeed, for the last week newspapers and commmentators have been telling us the same story. The statement is nevertheless disappointing. Hopefully, after review of the changing situation, as promised by Mr. Rogers, those planes will be sent.

I believe a close examination of the Middle East situation will confirm the need for such a shipment if Israel is to maintain her independence. Only the other day, we learned that the situation in the Middle East was quite altered. The Soviet Union has been sending and installing SAM–3 missiles in the United Arab Republic. To expedite matters, over 1,500 Soviet troops have been sent to train the Arabs in the use of the missiles. This adds a new dimension to the Middle Eastern situation. In addition, France remains intransigent in her declared policy of sending over 150 Mirage jets to the belligerent Libya. The Soviet Union is shipping 15 to 20 planes per month into Egypt. Egypt can, therefore, afford to lose 20 planes for every one of Israel's without sacrificing her military strength.

At this point in time, Israel's pilots are concededly superior. Yet, much of Israel's equipment is archaic and outdated. Israel loses dozens of pilots and Air Force personnel from mishaps caused by faulty equipment on an Air Force that predates 1956, while Syria and Egypt can claim to have two of the most modern air forces in the world today. The number of Israeli planes is currently but one-fifth of the Arab forces, and that number is likely to decrease still further because of archaic equipment.

In 1968, Mr. Nixon declared his firm and unqualified support for Israel's position in the Middle East. I would like to quote from a 1968 statement he made on the subject during the presidential campaign. I feel that the content is quite revealing. He said:

> Israel must possess sufficient power to deter an attack. As long as the threat of an Arab attack remains direct and imminent, sufficient power means the balance must be tipped in Israel's favor.

Let me explain that from a highly technical standpoint. An exact balance of power, which in any case is purely theoretical and not realistic, would run risks that the potential aggressors might miscalculate and would offer them too much temptation. For that reason—to provide Israel a valid self-defense—I support a policy that would give Israel a technological military margin to more than offset her hostile neighbor's numerical superiority."

He then continued:

> We support Israel because we oppose aggression in every form. We support Israel because it is threatened by Soviet imperialism and we support Israel because it offers hope in the Middle East . . . Israel cannot afford to lose even once.

Mr. Speaker, my purpose here is not to redeliver President Nixon's campaign speech. Rather, it is to highlight Mr. Nixon's analysis of the Middle East question—he said that his administration would come to the support of Israel in her hour of need.

All events today—the introduction of the Soviet missiles, the planes to Libya, the increased Arab aggression point up the fact that Israel's need has intensified and will continue to grow.

Any advantage that Israel now claims can be easily and quickly lost should the Soviet Union's offensive continue. In the meantime, the Arabs have not changed their avowed claim to destroy Israel. The armaments installed in Egypt may well change Israel's already tenuous superiority. I believe that there is a clear and present danger to the security of Israel in the Middle East.

As I said earlier, I hope that a reassessment and review of the situation will lead to a reaffirmation—in word and in deed—of Mr. Nixon's 1968 campaign statement. The security of Israel depends on it.

MR. McCORMACK'S REMARKS BEFORE THE NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE CONFERENCE OF THE BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT, AFL–CIO

(Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker. In my extension, I enclose remarks made by me on March 23, 1970 before the National Legislative Conference of the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL–CIO:

President Haggerty, Bishop Williams, Officers and Delegates of the 15th National Legislative Conference of the Building and Construction Trades Department, AFL–CIO:

President Nixon's Construction Statement last week was an acknowledgment of the desperate straits in which this nation's homebuilding industry now finds itself. Our current housing depression was foisted upon the industry by this Administration's misguided policies. It resulted in a 40 percent drop in housing starts last year. This, at a time when the nation's unmet housing needs were never greater. On March 17, the Wall Street Journal reported that non-residential construction is now expected to likewise suffer a marked decline in the months ahead.

Unemployment in the construction industry now stands at some 8 percent compared with 5.5 percent when President Nixon took office. Total counted unemployment in February reached almost 4 million.

The seriousness of the plight in which the homebuilding industry finds itself cannot be over-emphasized. The impact of new residential construction is a major force in and spreads throughout the entire American economic structure.

The difference between the 1,878,000 annual rate of housing starts in January of 1969 and the 1,166,000 annual rate for January 1970 meant the loss of $8.5 billion in direct construction expenditures. It also meant the loss of 1.5 million man years of work, half of it on-site and half of it in materials production. This loss of some 700,000 houses, by way of example, meant the loss of a market for 890,000 bathtubs, 511,000 furnaces, 224,000 garbage disposal units, 7 million kitchen cabinets, 8.4 million doors, and 1.4 million tons of steel, and 66 billion pounds of cement.

Every reliable economic indicator now gives evidence that the country is slipping into an economic recession. We are thus witnessing an unfortunate replay of what happened to this nation's economy during the 1950's. In 1957 the Republican Administration, as has been the case during the past year, pursued economic policies which crippled the housing industry. The sickness in housing then spread like a virus through the entire economy. The result was the 1958 recession when unemployment reached 7 percent, our highest post-World War II level. So great was the economic slump that year that Government revenues were drastically reduced, resulting in a thirteen billion dollar deficit for F.Y. 1959. Unless action is taken and taken immediately by the President, I fear a similar economic catastrophe awaits the country.

While the Executive Branch has presided over the strangulation of the homebuilding industry, the 91st Congress by way of contrast has striven to bring some measure of relief to this beleaguered industry. Last year's housing legislation, approved by the House 339 to 9, contained a provision which makes available $2 billion to the Government National Mortgage Association to purchase FHA and VA mortgages on low-cost housing. The release of these funds which has not taken place would provide over 100,000 units of new housing to those most acutely in need of shelter, low- and moderate-income families. It would have also provided much needed employment for construction workers. The President, however, refuses to utilize these funds. The Congress also in Public Law 91–151 granted the President authority to impose selective credit controls. The utilization of this authority would permit the channeling of available credit into those activities which national policy requires, such as low- and moderate-income housing. Other forms of credit, such as commercial paper, which are far more inflationary could be sharply curtailed and thus reduce inflationary pressures. Although this measure received the near unanimous approval of the House, 358 to 4, the President in signing the legislation declared he would never exercise the authority to establish credit controls.

The Administration's housing policy has as one of its chief victims our returning veterans. The Administration's tight money policy denies them the opportunity to take advantage of the VA home loan program which the Congress has established. To rectify this situation the Committee on Veterans Affairs has reported out H.R. 9476 which would authorize the investment of $5 billion of the veterans' own insurance monies in the National Service Life Insurance fund in VA mortgages. There is not a dime of government money involved. This measure has received the endorsement of all veterans' organizations and enjoys widespread support from all elements of the housing industry. Opposition is confined to the Nixon Administration. Veterans would be two-way beneficiaries of H.R. 9476. First, over 250,000 additional homes would be provided for veterans. Secondly, the fund, now a captive market for government bonds yielding a sub-market 3.9 percent, would experience a return of 7½ percent, the VA mortgage rate of 8½ percent less 1 percent administration fee, on the $5 billion invested in mortgages. It would likewise reduce unemployment in the construction industry.

The Housing Subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee has reported out an urban transit program of $5 billion. This represents an almost 40 percent increase over the figure recommended by the Nixon Administration. This legislation is vitally needed to solve the acute transportation problems in our traffic clogged urban areas. It too should provide many jobs for construction workers. The action of the Congress last year in raising the President's request for an appropriation of some $300 million to $800 million for the construction of sewage treatment plants, if the Administration will utilize the funds, should provide a major breakthrough in the fight against water pollution and be an immense help to the construction industry.

As you all know, the Congress has passed Public Law 91–54 providing for the promotion of health and safety in the construction industry. I would point out that this measure is another example of Congressional, rather than Executive, initiated legislation. The House likewise on January 27, 1970 passed H.R. 860, Joint Industry Promotion Boards, a major legislative goal of your organization, by a vote of 189 to 186. Democrats voted 148 to 60 for this progressive measure. Republicans were recorded 126 to 41 against. This by the way is the third time this legislation has passed the House.

This year the Congress will pass additional legislation in the air and water pollution fields together with highway legislation which should help to revive the construction industry.

The President's announcement that he is releasing $1.5 billion in Congressionally appropriated funds for federally assisted construction projects, clearly an effort to soften the recessionary slide of the economy, is most welcome. It is a small step in reversal of Administration policy which has brought on increasing unemployment, shorter work weeks, a depressed housing industry, declining production and disregard for the human effects of these failing policies. We believe the President's action resulted from the attention which we in Congress have focused on the Administration's failures. I hope the President will now also release $1.8 billion of frozen funds for direct federal projects, and take necessary actions to control inflation, and prevent an economic recession.

HEARINGS TO LOWER INTEREST RATES

(Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, today the House Committee on Banking and Currency held hearings on House Conference Resolutions 522, 523, 524, and 525. These resolutions, if enacted, would express the sense of Congress in its opposition to the current high interest rate, tight money situation and call on the administration to make every effort to reverse this policy in all programs. Further, the resolution would call on the Federal Reserve Board to take steps immediately to roll back the prime interest rate, which now is at the historic high of 8.5 percent.

Mr. Speaker, approximately 85 Members of Congress have sponsored this resolution from both sides of the aisle.

I have recommended to Mr. Wright of Texas and Mr. Alexander of Arkansas, who are to be commended for having taken the lead on this subject in this instance, that they constitute this group as a steering committee to appeal to all Members of the Congress to become members in support of this resolution.

I heartily commend all the members of the House who have joined in this resolution and trust that the House Banking and Currency Committee will expeditiously report the resolution to the floor and allow all the members of this House to go on record against the current restrictive economic policy of high interest rates and tight money which falls so overbearingly on consumers, workers, farmers, small business men, and the proposed financing for State and local municipal facilities.

Mr. Speaker, a list of the members who have cosponsored this resolution, by State, follows:

SMALL BUSINESS NEEDS A STRONG MAGNA-CARTA

(Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have always referred to the Robinson-Patman Act as the Magna Carta of small business. And I consider the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act in 1936 as one of the most personally satisfying laws that I have been connected with since I have been a member of this body.

I cannot help but wonder how many small businesses would have closed their doors had the Robinson-Patman Act not been on the books. The act prevents price discrimination by suppliers to competitors in the marketplace. It makes certain that the little man is not penalized because he is little. This is the same thought that the drafters of the Magna-Carta had in mind and this is the thought behind the Robinson-Patman Act.

There are those who now seek to weaken the Robinson-Patman Act, if not totally destroy it. This must not be allowed to happen. I do not contend that the Robinson-Patman Act is perfect for there have been those who, rather than trying to work within the spirit of the act, have sought to subvert it through loopholes. However, if any changes are to be made in the act, we must strengthen, not weaken, it, for the very future of small business in this country could well depend upon the strength of the Robinson-Patman Act.

In the March issue of the monthly publication of the National Association of Retail Druggists, the group's executive secretary, Mr. Williard Simmons, spoke out sharply against any attempt to water down the Robinson-Patman Act. The National Association of Retail Druggists worked long and hard for the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act and many druggists will tell you that the act saved their business. I am including the following copy of Mr. Simmon's article so that every Member of this body may have an opportunity to see what would happen to small businessmen in their districts if there is any dilution of the effects of the Robinson-Patman Act:

ROBINSON-PATMAN ACT UNDER FIRE

(By Williard Simmons)

Among the more outstanding accomplishments in the legislative field has been those activities of the NARD which led to the passage of the Robinson-Patman Act of 1936.

In view of the constantly increasing attempts to erode the enforcement provisions of the Robinson-Patman Act, it might be well for all NARD members to review some of the developments which resulted in Congress adopting this all-important legislation.

The history of federal anti-trust laws is a complicated one and we have every reason to believe that major attempts are being made to use the complications to confuse those who would honestly wish to interpret the law in terms of its most equitable affect on our economic system and the nation's small businessmen.

The basic federal anti-trust law was the Sherman Act of 1890, followed by the supplementary Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914, the Clayton Anti-Trust Act, and the Robinson-Patman Price Discrimination Act, as well as state Fair Trade laws. Changes in these laws have taken place through legislative action and judicial interpretation over the years.

At this moment we're concerned with the Robinson-Patman Act. It was enacted for the purpose of preventing price discrimination by suppliers to competitors in the marketplace. Its intent was to prevent large retailers, or other large businesses, from putting their smaller competitors out of business by using their bigness to influence suppliers to give them privileged discounts, which in turn gave them the advantage needed to undersell smaller competitors who were denied that special treatment.

The Robinson-Patman Act, of which the distinguished Congressman Wright Patman from Texas was co-author, has served well to protect small businessmen. The Act has been subject to the erosion of time, and loopholes have been found that have impaired its protectiveness; but it continues to be a barrier against laissez-faire business methods.

Now, some of those who would like to trample ruthlessly over their smaller competitors are trying to do away with this law. The Select Committee on Small Business of the House of Representatives has been asked to review the law and its effects; and its foes are marshaling their forces to have it repealed or made ineffective by amendments.

At our recent convention we were fortunate to be addressed by Congressman Patman who said: "It is no secret that there are some who would like to see the Robinson-Patman Act weakened, if not destroyed altogether. I have always regarded this Act as a Magna-Carta of small business and along with the other anti-trust laws it should be strengthened, not weakened.

"Steps must also be taken to see that this law is enforced with vigor all down the line to assure that there is not discrimination against retail druggists."

I am sure every NARD member will endorse Congressman Patman's position with enthusiasm. We urge all retail pharmacists to alert Congressmen and Senators to the dangers which may accrue if small business is allowed to be destroyed by the misuse of the competitive purchasing power of big business.

TEXTILE COMMITTEE REPLIES TO THE HONORABLE FUKUDA

(Mr. DORN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DORN. Mr. Speaker, the Honorable Hajime Fukuda, representing the Special Committee for Textiles of the Liberal Democratic Party of Japan, contacted, it is my understanding, every member of the Congress outlining the position of the Government of Japan with reference to Japanese textile exports to the United States. The following is the reply sent to Mr. Fukuda in Tokyo by the leadership of our Informal Textile Committee of the House. I recommend a very careful study of our reply, which follows, by my colleagues in the Congress:

U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., March 19, 1970.

HON. HAJIME FUKUDA,
House of Representatives,
Tokyo, Japan.

DEAR MR. FUKUDA: As the elected officers of the Informal Textile Committee of the United States House of Representatives, we are responding to your letter of March 1 concerning the problem of Japanese textile exports to the United States. We agree with your view of the urgency of the situation and of the need to take action promptly to resolve it. However, we are unable to agree with the approach suggested by you.

As you must know, the textile sector poses special problems for all mature industrial countries. In our case, the sector is so large and so important economically and socially that we cannot afford to remain indifferent to its fate. We must also remember in this connection the quarter million wool growers and half million cotton producers of the United States whose future depends upon the preservation of a vigorous textile industry.

The United States Government has made a sincere and good faith effort to negotiate a viable bilateral agreement to ease the pressures on our textile market. Our government has not urged upon Japan any arrangement which need cost her a single job. But these efforts have been rejected.

On numerous occasions in the past, the Government of Japan has felt it necessary to take steps in the area of economic policy which have been detrimental to U.S. interests. The United States has not retaliated, but circumstances have now changed dramatically.

You should know that Japan's position on the textile matter, as well as on other trade and investment issues, is profoundly affecting the attitude of the United States Congress toward Japan.

Your government, which has admittedly either negotiated restraints on various products with other countries or has permitted such countries to unilaterally impose quotas on your textile products, so far has refused to negotiate seriously with the United States.

Our own experience and familiarity with the situation in the United States industry has convinced us that excessive imports of textile and apparel articles are causing widespread damage and that the American textile industry and its employees are faced with a fundamental threat to their future.

At any rate, the proper GATT principle involved here is not the Escape Clause, as you suggest, but Market Disruption. It is on this latter GATT principle that the Long Term Arrangement for Cotton Textiles (LTA) has been successfully based since 1962. Furthermore, experience under the LTA has demonstrated conclusively that a comprehensive overall approach is the only effective one when dealing with such a highly diversified industry as textiles. As a matter of fact, the necessity for such a comprehensive approach has been recognized by our two governments as long ago as the U.S.-Japan cotton textile bilateral agreement of 1957.

Your expression of the allegedly "bitter experiences" of the Japanese textile industry with the Long Term Cotton Textile Arrangement is astonishing. U.S. imports of cotton textiles and apparel from Japan have increased from 235 million square yards in 1961 to 396 million in 1969. Total United States cotton textile imports have more than doubled during the life of the LTA.

Your point that not only Japan but a number of other exporting countries as well are contributing to the U.S. textile import problem is well taken. As the 1957 Japanese bilateral—then representing the largest portion of U.S. cotton textile imports—preceded negotiation of the LTA, so Japanese bilateral controls over man-made fiber and wool textile trade with the U.S. should precede multilateral negotiations under GATT. Certainly, the multilateral GATT negotiation should follow closely upon conclusion of the bilateral.

We are pleased to see that you consider relations with the United States to be more important than those with any other country. We are without doubt your most important customer. In addition, at tremendous expense, we are providing for the major defense of Japan against outside threats. In the last quarter century we have witnessed with great admiration Japan's remarkable economic growth. We are proud of our cooperation in that fantastic progress.

It is particularly disappointing to us in light of this history that Japan has prolonged discussions of the textile question for almost one year without making a constructive counterproposal on the issue at hand. Unfortunately, we are forced to conclude that it will be necessary for us to deal with this problem directly. We hope that you will understand our position on this matter, but believe that the time has come when further discussion is pointless unless there is an immediate and responsive change in the position of your government.

Respectfully and sincerely,

———, Chairman.

CHARLES R. JONAS,
Vice Chairman.

WM. JENNINGS BRYAN DORN,
Secretary, House Informal Textile Committee.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF JAPAN,
Tokyo, Japan, March 1, 1970.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Special Committee for Textiles of the Liberal Democratic Party of Japan, I take pleasure as the chairman of the Committee in sending you herewith a brief explanation of the basic Japanese views with regard to the problem of Japanese textile exports to the United States. I am taking the liberty of doing so in view of the urgency and importance of the matter in the light of U.S.-Japan economic relations.

In spite of sincere and serious efforts on the part of both the United States and Japan to find a solution to the textile problem, there are no signs of a solution in sight yet. A careful study of the past developments of the textile issue will show that the major obstacle hindering the solution to the problem is that the United States does not fully understand the fundamental views of Japan on this issue. Should the friendly relations between the United States and Japan be allowed to deteriorate by the lack of the understanding on both sides, it would be truly an unfortunate incident not only to Japan but also to the development of the free world.

I sincerely hope that this will serve to broaden your better understanding of our fundamental views on the matter and dispel any misunderstanding which might be harbored by some Americans.

In November of 1969 President Nixon and Prime Minister Sato reached an agreement with regard to the reversion of Okinawa to Japan which had been a long standing aspiration of the Japanese people. This agreement would not have been reached without the understanding and support of the Senators and Representatives of the United States Congress. My colleagues and I are deeply appreciative and grateful for your support and understanding shown in the reversion of Okinawa to Japan.

I consider our relations with the United States are far more important than those with any other country. I firmly believe the maintenance of our close cooperative relations in all fields will be a vital factor in the achievement of peace and prosperity of the world.

Sincerely yours,
Chairman of the Special Committee for Textiles of the Liberal Democratic Party of Japan.

THE BASIC JAPANESE VIEWS WITH REGARD TO THE PROBLEM OF JAPANESE TEXTILE EXPORTS TO THE UNITED STATES

I. THE BASIC POSITION OF JAPAN ON THE TEXTILE ISSUE

A. During the U.S.-Japan Fact-Finding Conference held last September in Washington, D.C. it was reported that one official of the United States delegation referred to the situation of the American textile industry as healthy on the whole. On the basis of the information and data available to Japan, it is extremely difficult to recognize that the American textile industry has been seriously injured or faces threat of serious injury caused by imports. Accordingly Japan cannot accept the United States arguments that comprehensive restrictions on exports of woolen and man-made fiber products to the United States are necessary.

B. The only proper approach to this problem should be one that is based on a selective approach in cases where injury has been proven. Japan feels the problem should basically be handled under the escape-clause procedures stipulated by the United States law which is in line with Article 19 of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT) that restrictive measures may be taken if it is proven a particular section or item of an industry has sustained serious injury or faces threat of injury due to increase of imports.

However, in view of the above and taking into consideration the current United States position on this problem, Japan is prepared to take appropriate measures with regard to those products concerning which sufficient proof of injury or threat of injury due to increased imports can be shown in fair and equitable procedures.

C. The whole problem of textiles concerns not only Japan but also a number of exporting countries. If Japan evaluates the impact of imported textile products on the American textile industry on the basis of its own judgments alone, it would invite criticism and distrust from these countries toward Japan. Therefore, the textile problem should be dealt with on a multilateral basis, including all the major exporting countries.

The Japanese position explained above is based on the principles of the GATT that only if a domestic industry has sustained serious injury or faces threat of serious injury caused by imports, temporary restrictive measures can be taken. On the basis of the internationally established principles of trade, a solution can be found to the textile problem which may not only involve a number of other exporting countries concerned but also adversely affect the development of international trade. At the same time domestically a solution can be found to the matter persuasive enough to secure understanding and support of the Japanese textile industry and the labor unions as well as general public.

II. BRIEF EXPLANATION OF THE U.S.-JAPAN DISCUSSION ON THE TEXTILE PROBLEM

A. In the course of the discussions between the United States and Japan during the past ten months on textile import restrictions, the United States has failed to present any convincing evidences to prove that a specific section of the American textile industry is facing serious difficulty in spite of repeated requests by Japan for the presentation of substantial data. At the U.S.-Japan Fact-Finding Conference of September of 1969 Japan was given little information on the difficult situation of specific items of the American textile industry. In February of 1970 the United States presented the statistical data to Japan in response to the Japanese request. Although voluminous, the United States data consisted mainly of statistics on imports and domestic production, and lacked complete, objective and concrete information sufficient to prove that specific items had been injured. Japan's repeated request for more data regarding injury caused by imports is not to prolong the discussions between the two countries, but to obtain the minimum data necessary to show evidence of injury.

B. Dissatisfaction has been expressed by some Americans that in spite of Japan's voluntary export controls on textile products to countries of European Economic Community (EEC), England, and Canada. Japan continues to oppose the United States demands for similar export restrictions on Japanese woolen and man-made fiber textile products. It should be noted that in the case of EEC countries such controls are not administered voluntarily by Japan, but are imposed unilaterally upon Japanese textile products by these countries.

There exists historic background for voluntary export controls on Japanese textile products to England and Canada. Based on an exchange of notes, these two countries forced Japan to agree to voluntary restrictions on Japanese exports of textiles in exchange for Japan's admission to the GATT, or the abolition of the invocation of the GATT Article 35 against Japan. Since that time, Japan had made consistent efforts to have such export restrictions eliminated and with the passage of time the number of restriction items was considerably reduced. In recent years Japan has not agreed to any additional voluntary export control demands from these countries. England has announced its plan to lift its restrictions on Japanese exports to England in a few years. It is reported that in preparing for the coming EEC–Japan trade talks EEC countries will also relax its restrictions on Japanese products.

III. SITUATION IN JAPAN

The Japanese textile industry has 1.9 million workers and 9 million people directly or indirectly connected with the textile industry. As in the United States, the industry in Japan is one of the most important. Members of the Japanese Diet are under heavy pressures from the domestic industry and business which forcefully advocate the principles of free trade. They are strongly opposed to compliance of any kind of unreasonable voluntary controls. The textile problem is a serious political issue and places members of the Japanese Diet in very difficult situation.

The Japanese textile industry cannot forget its bitter experiences in connection with the Cotton Long-Term Arrangements (LTA) for a number of reasons, some of which are:

(1) The voluntary controls on Japanese cotton textile exports to the United States which was begun in 1956 was later extended into the International Cotton Long-Term Arrangement with more cotton textile items under its restrictions in 1962 at the insistence of the United States.

(2) In spite of the LTA goal of orderly expansion of cotton textile trade, its application of the LTA became extremely restrictive.

(3) Although the LTA was concluded as a temporary measure, an exception to the principles of free trade, it has indeed become a long-term measure.

Because of the bitter experiences above, all concerned in the Japanese textile industry are deeply concerned and apprehensive over the U.S. demands for restrictions on Japanese exports of textiles in spite of the fact that it was internationally agreed in Article 1 of the LTA that these measures are not to be considered as lending themselves to application in other fields.

The United States repeatedly presented to Japan proposals on voluntary export restrictions on Japanese textile products which did not reflect the Japanese basic position and feeling of the Japanese textile industry. The way the United States presented the proposals to Japan was taken by the Japanese textile industry as coercive, and led to unified and strong opposition of both the management and labor of the Japanese textile industry to the unreasonable settlement of this problem.

The Japanese Government cannot commit itself to restrictions on exports of textile products to the United States without the consent and understanding of the textile industry. Therefore, unless the basic position explained above is adhered to, the Government cannot persuade the textile industry to agree to any voluntary restrictions on exports of Japanese textile products to the United States.

TO OFFER PAYMENT LIMIT; LISTS FARMERS WHO GOT OVER $25,000 IN 1969

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) for 20 minutes.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, the moment of decision is fast approaching in the House Committee on Agriculture as to the future course of feed grains, wheat, and cotton programs. Authority under the Agricultural Act of 1965 expires this year. Anticipating the possibility—remote though it is—that this Congress will enact no follow-up legislation, the Department of Agriculture is taking the essential first steps under the old permanent law to call a wheat referendum in August.

It is my belief that the Committee on Agriculture will report out a bill, and within the next very few weeks. It is also my belief that it will amount to an extension of the Agricultural Act of 1965 with no fundamental changes, only a little cosmetic treatment here and there.

The 1965 act had no limitation on individual payments, and I forecast that the end product of the Committee on Agriculture will contain no limitation on payments, at least none worthy of the word. Possibly the reported bill will contain a gesture toward the limitation concept, perhaps something like the one suggested by the Department of Agriculture which would let wealthy farmers like Senator EASTLAND draw as much as $110,000 per crop each year from the U.S. Treasury.

A limitation at this level would mock the word limitation. It would be unacceptably high to me, and I believe to a majority of House members. On several occasions during the past 2 years the House has voted by a 3-to-2 margin to establish a $20,000 per farm limit on payments. Last year this provision was dropped from an appropriations bill only under pressure of Christmas Eve adjournment, and then only by four votes. Many Congressmen, and many farmers, believe $20,000 is much too high.

Over the past 6 years I have campaigned persistently among my colleagues in behalf of the payment-limit concept. I have offered limitations at various levels from $50,000 a year to as low as $10,000 a year. The concept is a sound one that each year wins wider acceptance, even among cotton belt farmers who would be most directly affected.

By this statement I announce to my colleagues that when the farm bill finally emerges from the Committee on Agriculture I will offer an amendment to establish an annual limitation on payments in the $20,000 range.

So that Members may see clearly the continued need for a limitation of this order I am placing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today a listing of all farmers in the Nation who last year received aggregate payments under commodity programs—excluding sugar and wool—in excess of $25,000.

The names are classified by counties within State categories, so it will be relatively easy for each Congressman or Senator to determine which of his constituents would be affected by my amendment and to what extent.

My colleagues will also find a comparison with the previous year instructive. For the most part, big payments are more numerous and higher than ever. See the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 115, part 10, page 13287, for a listing of 1969 payments.

A USDA study was cited a year ago which shows that a limitation on payments, such as I am proposing, will have no serious adverse effects on production or on the effectiveness of production adjustment programs and would yield annual budget savings from $200 million to nearly $300 million. These same arguments for approving a limit on farm program payments are still valid. With increasing pressure for bringing inflation under control and trimming Federal expenses, these savings to the treasury should be welcome by all of us.

In evaluating the impact of the payment limit on the bank accounts of these fortunate farmers, it should be kept in mind that my amendment would not leave any of them exactly penniless. Each would continue to receive $20,000 a year, which is extremely generous when compared with even the most extravagant proposals for family income guarantees.

Total payees and total payments rose sharply last year in this category. In 1968 5,914 payees received $273,333,643. In 1969 7,795 payees received $366,779,995.

Of great public interest has been the level of payments to Eastland Plantation, Sunflower County, Miss. In 1968 payments totalled $116,978. The data below shows 1969 was a much better year for the plantation, at least in terms of money from the U.S. Treasury, as the total rose to $146,792.

Mr. Speaker, I am informed that another Member has also placed in this RECORD the same data, and in order to save expense I will not repeat it at this point.

RHODESIAN POLICY ILL-ADVISED

(Mr. WAGGONNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

Mr. WAGGONNER. Mr. Speaker, I have addressed the House on a number of occasions to express my concern over this Nation's ill-advised policy toward Rhodesia since that nation declared its independence from Great Britain. Even though a previous administration started us down the ridiculous policy road we have been on since that event, I had hoped against hope that the Nixon administration would see the utter futility of continuing to harass the Rhodesian Government, would cease acting as Great Britain's paw and as a toady follower of the United Nations.

My hopes were raised when the President said in his inaugural address:

> Let all nations know that during this Administration our lines of communication will be open. We seek an open world, open to ideas, open to the exchange of goods and people, a world in which no people, great or small will live in angry isolation. We cannot expect to make everyone our friend, but we can try to make no-one our enemy.

Yet, the President has seen fit to close the U.S. Consulate in Rhodesia, effectively isolating that nation which is guilty of only one thing, declaring itself to be free and independent from Great Britain. The President has closed our lines of communication. He has brought about a closed world, closed to ideas, closed to the exchange of people and a world in which a friendly nation has been forced into isolation.

The Prime Minister of Rhodesia has expressed regret over this slap in the face and has assured us that, in spite of it, the interests of our American citizens will continue to be protected by his government.

Several items have come to my attention in the past week which comment on this misguided step of the Nixon administration and I would like to share them with you.

This is a shameful step our Government has taken and I hope that commonsense will return to the White House and the State Department soon and this closing countermanded. No man can take pride in what has been done.

The articles I refer to appear herewith:

BRITAIN, U.S. UNREALISTIC ON RHODESIA

(By Anthony Lejeune)

LONDON—The first rule in international affairs is "Be realistic." To deceive oneself is, at best, folly; at worst, an invitation to catastrophe. As an example of obstinate unrealizing it would be hard to beat the policies adopted by the Western powers, particularly Britain and America, towards Rhodesia.

So let's state a few plain truths.

1. Everything which has happened in Rhodesia has been inevitable and predictable for at least 10 years—since Britain first tried to push the white Rhodesians into accepting constitutional changes which would have meant the loss, in a very short while, of their country as they had built it and known it.

2. It was equally inevitable and predictable that sanctions would fail. When Harold Wilson said, four years ago, that the Rhodesian rebellion would be over "within weeks, not months" he was either being flagrantly and short-sightedly dishonest, in the hope of warding off pressure from the Afro-Asian members of the Commonwealth, or else he was crassly refusing to believe what everybody who knew anything about Africa must have told him.

3. International disapproval matters very little to Rhodesia, so long as the back door to South Africa remains open. And South Africa must, in practice, support Rhodesia, because if Rhodesia could be brought down, the same weapons would certainly be turned against South Africa.

4. Rhodesia, South Africa and the Portuguese provinces are perfectly capable of dealing with any foreseeable threat, whether from internal subversion or from Communist-equipped infiltrators.

5. Short of some lunatic and (one hopes) inconceivable military adventure, there is nothing the outside world, however disapproving, can do about the Republic of South Africa or the Republic of Rhodesia.

Ian Smith's declaration of a republic is, we are told, "illegal." But very few republics were born legally—certainly neither the United States nor the Soviet Union was. Sooner or later and generally sooner, the world had to accept them. There is nothing uniquely wicked about Rhodesia; on the contrary, there is far less cruelty and injustice there than in many states which occupy honored places at the United Nations.

The only difference lies in the sanctions which Wilson was foolish enough to invoke, and the United Nations to impose, on the ludicrously false grounds that it was Rhodesia, not the African nationalists menacing her from neighboring territories, which constituted "a threat to world peace."

It is a great pity that America connived at this hypocrisy, this foolishness, this unrealism. And it is a pity that the secretary of state, Rogers, should still be identifying America with the "unfinished business" of trying to overthrow the government of Rhodesia, South Africa and Portuguese Africa.

Let's be realistic again. What are, or should be, the objects of British and American policy in southern Africa?

First, surely, the protection of our own interests, the West's interests, in this strategically and commercially very important part of the world. We need the sea routes around the Cape. We need Rhodesian chrome. We need friendly governments there.

Secondly, we desire the happiness, freedom and well-being of the people, both white and black, who live there. Can we really believe that they would be better off under the sorts of regime which now prevail north of the Zambezi?

All we have succeeded in doing so far is to drive Rhodesia into South Africa's arms, and to make South Africa a more united country than she has ever been before. Sanctions have strengthened Rhodesia: It is Britain and the West they hurt.

The wisest and kindest course for America would be to help Britain off the hook on which a decade of unrealism has impaled her.

U.S. SLAP AT RHODESIA WAS A DISGRACEFUL ACT

(By James J. Kilpatrick)

At a time when foreign news is dominated by a deepening involvement in Laos and by continuing tension in the Middle East, the decision of the Nixon Administration to close the U.S. Consulate in Rhodesia will attract small attention.

Yet this was a disgraceful act by the President, a weak and pusillanimous act, rooted in hypocrisy, having nothing in its favor but political expedience. The best that can be said is that the decision is consistent, at least, with all that has gone before: It is one more blunder.

The decision is wrong on its merits. For better or for worse, American industry retains large investments in Rhodesia. Many American nationals live there. Hundreds of American tourists visit Rhodesia every year. To close the small but useful consulate is an affront to common sense.

This is the least of the wrongness. Abandonment of the U.S. Consulate is a symbolic act, a political and diplomatic gesture. It is a way of saying, to quote Secretary Rogers, that the United States "continues to regard Great Britain as the lawful sovereign in Rhodesia."

Such a posture is pure sham, of course, and Rogers knows it. The proposition is as spurious as the palpable lie, solemnly propounded by the United Nations, that Rhodesia has threatened international peace and security since November of 1965. The blunt fact is that Britain holds no sovereignty whatever in Rhodesia today.

Why is this fact not accepted philosophically? Why do we persist, as to Rhodesia, in pursuing a foreign policy violative of every principle of law, history, and self-interest?

The rule of non-intervention in the internal affairs of other nations is a principle explicitly stated in the charter of the United Nations. By going along with the Afro-Asian lynch mob in the imposition of sanctions against Rhodesia, the United States has closed its eyes to this principle.

Our course of action makes a mockery of our own history. What is the great event we shall celebrate in 1976? Why, sir, it is the 200th anniversary of our own unilateral declaration of independence from the British crown. It is we who provided the high example for Rhodesia; our own founding fathers, renouncing colonial status, dissolved the political bands which had connected them with another. We call them patriots. And what an irony it is for the United States, thus born, to assert the illegitimacy of Rhodesia! What sanctimony, to denounce Ian Smith and his colleagues as rebels!

Diplomacy ought to be based, if not on principle, if not on law, if not on history, at least upon self-interest. Even this homely rule has been lost in the chain of blunders. As one consequence, the United States now finds itself in this imbecile position, that we must purchase vitally needed chrome at high price from the Soviet Union, our avowed enemy, rather than at low cost from Rhodesia, whose only offense is to adhere to the West.

Dean Acheson, former secretary of state, summed up the travesty in a speech to the American Bar Assn. two years ago. In its course of conduct against Rhodesia, he said, "The United States is engaged in an international conspiracy, instigated by Britain, and blessed by the United Nations, to overthrow the government of a country that has done us no harm and threatens no one. This is bare-faced aggression, unprovoked and unjustified by a single legal or moral principle."

Nothing has changed since Acheson delivered that stinging reproach. Rhodesia has overcome the United Nations sanctions. She has resisted the Communist-trained terrorists, based in Zambia, who in fact constitute a threat to African peace. She has proclaimed her status as a wholly independent republic. She will triumph over those peace-loving members of the United Nations who would wage war upon her. And she surely will survive the mean, needless and contemptible act of the Nixon Administration in destroying the last small symbol of a friendship far better than we ever deserved.

PUSILLANIMOUS SURRENDER

(By Andrew Tully)

WASHINGTON.—President Nixon's pusillanimous surrender to the international wetpants liberal mob on the Rhodesia question is a reminder that politics does not stop at the north portico of the White House. Nixon is looking for Negro votes and the approbation of those singular characters who could give our last dime to the United Nations.

Nixon let Secretary of State William P. Rogers do the dirty work on this one. In a Sunday School manner which must have pained the usually hard-nosed Rogers, our top diplomat made a point of the racial issue in announcing that the U.S. will cut its last tie with white-ruled Rhodesia by closing its consulate-general in Salisbury.

Rogers, of course, noted that the U.S. "has regarded and continues to regard the United Kingdom as the lawful sovereign" despite Rhodesia's declaration of independence in November, 1965. Baloney. The action was taken to score points with Africa's Negro leaders, who put Rogers through the old arm-twisting routine during his African tour last month.

Washington has never recognized Ian Smith's Rhodesian regime, but had kept the consulate open for more than four years to protect American interests. Now it has decided, after Rogers' poll taking, that the U.S. henceforth will throw in its lot with Africa's Negro majorities.

I suppose this action is okay in that it will please the Black Panthers, the Students for a Democratic Society and other untidy howlers, some of them ensconced in New York penthouses. But I expect it caused the remains of folks like George Washington, Tom Jefferson and Lafayette to revolve in their graves.

But in Rhodesia's case, the elegantly raffish UN is now demanding that Britain take all necessary measures "to put an end to the rebellion of the Smith regime." Naturally. The UN now is dominated by nations, some of them so-called, with less than 10 per cent of the world's population and which contributes less than 5 per cent of the UN budget.

In fact, the Rhodesia case is an ominous example of the way these half-baked nations work their will. Britain would have let Ian Smith go his independent way had it not been for pressure from these unfrocked cutpurses, directed by the Soviet Union and its Communist flunkies. Britain had enough on its frazzled mind without needling in Rhodesia's internal affairs.

It is a curious, if not sinister, situation. The UN has proved it couldn't keep the peace in a tearoom. This assembly of third-rate international ward heelers and saloon statesmen is supported in the U.S. only by professional do-gooders, dismissed public servants and a claque of bankers and merchants who can smell loot. Its flavor is mostly foreign and therefore delectable to silly women, busted Ph.D.'s and Anglophiles.

Yet we find the Nixon-Rogers team capitulating to this crowd and even admitting that principle runs second to the opportunity to improve U.S. relations with Africa's Negro nations. Maybe what we need is a ruddy king, who doesn't have to go foraging for votes.

STROM THURMOND REPORTS TO THE PEOPLE—OUR STAKE IN AFRICA

The Department of State has announced its intention to close the American Consulate in Salisbury, Rhodesia on March 17. This decision is a lamentable one and should be reversed.

Earlier this month, Rhodesia severed all relations with Great Britain. Although Rhodesia sometime ago declared its independence, its leaders clung to the hope that Great Britain would see the futility of its anti-Rhodesian policy and agree to an amicable settlement within the British Commonwealth. The Rhodesian people, through ties of history and sentiment, found it difficult to break their allegiance to the British Crown, but the unreasonable attitude of Britain's political leaders left no other choice.

With the question of Rhodesia's independence irrevocably settled, there can be no doubt that the Rhodesian government has both legal and actual control of its territory. The United States should recognize this valiant African country as a sovereign state. Now is the time to take steps to improve, not sever, relations with those African States with which our Nation has the most in common. The time has come to take the long range view in Africa and adopt policies which will protect the major American interests.

The United States has vital interests at stake with the governments of the Southern African States; that is, Rhodesia, South Africa, and the overseas provinces of Portugal, namely, Angola and Mozambique. The future of Europe—and the United States—may well depend upon the friendship of these three governments. With the Suez Canal closed—and little likelihood that it can be opened, the vital oil link with the Mid-Eastern oil fields is the shipping route around the tip of Africa. Even if the Suez Canal should be opened, the new gigantic supertankers make it more efficient to ship oil on this route.

Therefore, we must be greatly concerned with whoever controls the Portuguese ports in the Indian Ocean and the South African ports on the Cape. An unfriendly, or even a neutral power, in control of these ports could control the oil lifeline of NATO. In these days of the destructive power of long range nuclear weapons, it is likely that an enemy might seek methods of blackmail that would fall short of unleasing major nuclear explosions. An oil blockade imposed upon the West would result in unacceptable economic and social burdens. The expanding Soviet submarine fleet, coupled with anti-Western powers controlling the ports, could impose severe contraints.

We should be working more closely with friendly countries for our common defense. In particular, South Africa's small Navy should be improved and enlarged. The South African naval base at Simonstown, on the Cape, should be modernized and increased in capacity to handle NATO ships. We should drop the embargo on selling armaments to South Africa, since it is no longer appropriate to the changed international strategic conditions. We cannot base our defenses upon the power balance of ten years ago.

Although Rhodesia is a land-locked country, we must remember that it is the only major source of high grade chromium ore besides the Soviet Union.

It would be a great strategic mistake for the United States to sever relations with this brave little Nation, since in a world crisis we will need the close friendship of Rhodesia in order to secure supplies of chromium ore which is vital to our defense. We must remember, too, that all of land-locked Rhodesia's chrome must be shipped through the Portuguese ports. Every reason, therefore, urges us to take positive steps toward improving our relations with these friends of the United States.

The time has come to take the long range view in Africa and adopt policies which will protect American interests. It is my hope the State Department will review the matter of Rhodesia and conclude that it is in the interest of our Nation not to close the Consulate there.

THE POSTAL STRIKE IS A NATIONAL EMERGENCY

(Mr. BLACKBURN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, the postal strike is a national emergency; it is not a political issue.

The President of the United States is dealing with it as an emergency affecting all Americans. He is acting under his constitutional authority, in fact, his constitutional duties.

Those who have gone out on strike have gone out in defiance of the law. The law applicable to postal workers must be upheld as would traffic laws upheld for all of us.

Under these circumstances it is a shame that some have seized on this strike as a political issue, as a way to divide the people, as a way to make personal political gains.

I refer, unfortunately, to a very few in the Congress, but I also refer to a Democratic candidate for Governor of New York, a man who should know better, Arthur Goldberg.

Mr. Speaker, to digress a moment, how could anyone who voted to confirm Arthur Goldberg for a seat on the Supreme Court oppose G. Harrold Carswell. Mr. Goldberg had no judicial experience when he went on the Court and he seems to have learned little since he went off of it.

Another who should know better is Lawrence O'Brien, who even better than most, is aware what this administration is doing to try to improve the Post Office and the conditions of postal workers.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat, delivery of the mails is not a political issue. I am sorry that some of the leaders of the other party find it difficult to recognize this fact.

RARE SUNDAY AFTERNOON

(Mr. WAMPLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to participate recently in the 100th birthday celebration of my constituent and dear friend, Lee Greer, of Pound, Va.

Uncle Lee, as he is known by so many, comes from a long line of distinguished, patriotic American citizens. It has been said that he is the dean of Republicans in southwest Virginia, and probably the entire State.

He has been deputy sheriff, carpenter, farmer, and postmaster. Even now his days are not idle, and he still talks with conviction of the Constitution and democracy.

Uncle Lee's birthday was March 17, but we celebrated it Sunday, March 15. Kinfolk and friends from near and far gathered at his daughter's home in Pound that afternoon. Brothers and sisters, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, nieces and nephews from New York, Kentucky, Ohio, and Virginia came with happy birthday wishes. A special guest was Uncle Lee's brother John from Myer, Ky. Uncle John will be 103 years old May 1.

A letter and card from President and Mrs. Nixon were presented, and also greetings from Virginia Governor Linwood Holton, who himself was born in southwest Virginia.

Most of all, it was a simple Sunday afternoon of friendship and talk. It was one of those Sunday afternoons which we remember from our childhood, but which we do not take much time for anymore. For this reason, I would like to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Bristol Virginia-Tennessean of March 17, 1970.

AS WE SEE IT—REAFFIRMING ROOTS

At the risk of sounding mundane, trite, sentimental, and a victim of cliches, we say, emphatically that America is very much alive and well in Southwest Virginia.

We are talking about the kind of disappearing America where friends and neighbors get together on a Sunday afternoon to kiss grandchildren, swap stories, smile for the group pictures—and, generally, display that unaffected respect for each other that has always been America.

There used to be a time when this kind of Sunday afternoon wasn't unusual; when it didn't merit special comment because everyone did it.

And it still isn't totally alien, especially in rural America, where friends and kin get together on sunny, summer Sunday afternoons and eat ice cream, watermelon and drink iced tea.

But it is becoming more alien than it should. Thus it was with a sense of joy mixed with profound sadness and nostalgia that we joined with others Sunday afternoon in Pound to help "Uncle" Lee Greer celebrate his 100th birthday.

They came from all over to the modest little home in Pound where "Uncle" Lee lives with his daughter. They were there because they were kinfolks or just good friends. And they were there because they respect Lee Greer and the 100 years he has been on this earth and because they respect the accomplishments, hopes, dreams of each other.

They listened reverently while "Uncle" Lee, an amazing man, recounted his childhood in Kentucky and Southwest Virginia. And, because they are simply Americans, they nodded in agreement when Lee Greer warned of the dangers threatening democracy.

It was an afternoon of no television, no loud records, no radios, no newspapers. It was just an afternoon of good, hardworking people, talking about their children, their grandchildren, and with pride about the things they had done, and were doing. It was an afternoon to talk about the weather and when spring would come and how beautiful the mountains would be in bloom again. It was an afternoon of posing with "Uncle" Lee and laughing with friends and relatives so seldom seen.

There was no real purpose in it, no organization, nothing planned—and it reminded one of the Sunday afternoons of childhood.

The world, as they say, is too much with us. Pressures and commitments and obligations and duties—and instant awareness and electronic gadgets—crowd in on every moment. There is scant time now for Sunday afternoons of friendship and talk.

But so long as these events occur, the roots of America are firm, if not as plentiful as perhaps they once were. It was the kind of Sunday that has made our country great and if, in this age of so-called sophistication, we are found guilty of a cliche then it is the same as indicting America as being a cliche.

So long as "Uncle" Lee Greers are among us, we can't accept that verdict.

THE REVEREND DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.—MONTGOMERY TO MEMPHIS

(Mr. RYAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Speaker, today, across the country, Americans will pay homage to a man of grace and dignity—the Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. In 1,000 theaters, in over 300 cities, 1 million Americans will see "King: A Filmed Record . . . Montgomery to Memphis," a documentary film showing the greatness of the man who stood in the forefront of the struggle for equal rights for all Americans.

A gentle man of love and honor, Dr. King has left all Americans a legacy of justice, compassion, and humility. The signs of recent times illustrate all too starkly how poorly this land has lived up to that legacy. Lamar, S.C.; the continuation of the war in Vietnam; the incipient war in Laos; the surrender of the administration to the foes of integration—a sad litany of injustice by man to man.

I urge my colleagues to pay tribute to Dr. King by attending this movie memorializing his struggle. And I urge them all as well to honor this man, and his people, and all people who believe in equal rights and in equal opportunity and in peace, by supporting H.R. 7703, which establishes January 15, the Reverend Dr. King's birthday, as a legal public holiday.

By honoring Dr. King, we honor all the people in this country who have struggled against prejudice and disadvantage. And we thereby commit ourselves to the ideals he exemplified—brotherhood, compassion, and concern for his fellow men.

Mr. Speaker, I include William Raspberry's column, Potomac Watch, which appeared in the March 23 edition of the Washington Post. It is a fine report on this movie recapturing Dr. King's struggle—our struggle.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 23, 1971]

POTOMAC WATCH—KING HAD A DREAM; FILM RECAPTURES IT

(By William Raspberry)

Aside from the fact that Ely Landau and his associates have put together an extraordinarily faithful account of the King years, using little more than every piece of newsreel they could lay hands on, there are two primary reminders in the movie, "KING: A Filmed Record . . . Montgomery to Memphis."

The first is how savage was the brutality visited upon civil rights workers, white and black, in the Deep South.

Many of us who were shocked by the brutality in Chicago in the summer of 1968, or by the recent inhumanity in Lamar, S.C., had forgotten how bad it can be. (The present college generation never knew it to begin with.)

We remember names like Bull Connor and Sheriff Clark; we remember the fire hoses and the police dogs—and Cicero—but we remember vaguely. Perhaps the mind protects itself from extinction by dimming intolerable memories.

But television film, which has it all over newspaper morgues in some regards, cannot forget. And at the recent preview of the King film, it all came back.

Many blacks who saw the preview—and I mean your well-educated, reasonable responsible blacks—confess that if the movie had ended with the savagery, they would not have trusted themselves to behave like human beings on the way home. Inhumanity, we discovered again, can make you at least temporarily inhuman.

But it also helped to explain the almost unparalleled esteem in which Dr. King is held, by white and black. For, incredibly, he really did love the enemy who was bent on his destruction. It is easy to forget what enormous strength and courage it takes to remain nonviolent in the face of unbelievable violence.

Too many of us, I suspect, would have been tempted to take the Nat Turner route, striking out at everything white until we ourselves were killed.

Nat Turner died a martyr (or at least we think so now), but he didn't change anything. Dr. King died a saint, and the world will never be the same again.

What kept those who saw the film from parting with their sanity was that the movie is, at bottom, an account of triumph.

And that is the other thing we've allowed ourselves to remember only dimly. August, 1963—can it have been only six and a half years ago?—was in its own way just as incredible as Bull Connor and his police dogs.

The movie comes as close as anything could to reminding us that the quarter of a million people who gathered at the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial really did believe it when they sang "We shall overcome" and "black and white together."

In our 1970s sophistication, we see August, 1963, as a sort of giant-sized picnic, an emotional jag, a time of good feeling and peace, with people going out of their way to be nice to each other.

But it was infinitely more, and more profound, than that. We really did believe that only a sort of mopping-up operation remained between us and the day when Americans, black and white, would live together in love and peace.

And more than that, we believed that the mopping up would not be left to Martin Luther King and John Fitzgerald Kennedy; we all had a part to play, and we were exquisitely grateful for the opportunity.

We, too, had a dream.

See the film because it will help you understand—and put a stop to—what is happening to us now, not just in Lamar, S.C., but in Washington, D.C., as well.

For while the spirit of Martin Luther King Jr. is not dead, neither is that of Bull Connor.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. WIDNALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced an act cosponsored by Mr. CONTE of Massachusetts, H.R. 16644, to clarify and extend the authority of the Small Business Administration and for other purposes. This is the administration's bill. A section-by-section analysis follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 101

Section 101 of the bill authorizes SBA, in connection with the financial assistance programs established by the Small Business Act, by the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, and by Title IV of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, to make loans in cooperation with persons or organizations not normally engaged in lending activity, as well as with banks and other lending institutions, and to service these loans; to extend guarantees to banks or other lending institutions, or to persons or organizations not normally engaged in lending activity, without requiring that advance approval be obtained from SBA for each of the related loans; and to make interest subsidy grants to persons who borrow from SBA, through the cooperation of banks or other lending institutions or through the cooperation of persons or organizations not normally engaged in lending activity. In no case, however, shall the amount of such a grant exceed the product of the amount of the loan multiplied by the least of (A) 3 percent; (B) one-third of the prevailing rate of interest applicable to the loan; or (C) the difference between the prevailing rate of interest applicable to the loan and five and one-half percent. No grant shall be made under this section relating to interest due on a loan later than three years from the time the loan was disbursed.

Section 102

Section 102 of the bill authorizes SBA to extend grants to public or private organizations to pay all or part of the costs of providing business management assistance and related technical aid to socially or economically disadvantaged persons. Included among the purposes of these grants is the payment of the costs, including tuition, of the participation of such persons in courses and training programs for the development of skills relating to any aspect of business management. Repealed by section 102 is section 406 of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964.

Section 103

Section 103 of the bill authorizes SBA to conduct research and studies with a view to identifying categories of small business which lack growth possibilities, as distinguished from small business built around innovations promising rapid growth, and with a view to identifying the nature and causes of small business failures. This section makes it clear that where necessary for the successful conduct of such research or study, or of any other research or study which it is authorized to undertake, SBA is to employ the services of experts and consultants.

Section 104

Section 104 of the bill provides that appropriations are authorized for the purposes of the programs under sections 101, 102, and 103 in such amounts as may be necessary.

TITLE II

Section 201

Section 201 amends section 103 of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958 (SBI Act of 1958) by adding a new paragraph (8), which defines a minority enterprise small business investment company (MESBIC) as a small business investment company (SBIC) whose investment policy states that its investments will be designed to contribute to a well-balanced national economy by facilitating ownership of small business concerns by persons who, because of social or economic disadvantages, have been hampered in their participation in the free enterprise system.

Section 202

Section 202 adds a new subsection (d) to section 301 of the SBI Act of 1958, providing that a MESBIC may be organized and chartered under the nonprofit corporation laws of any State, and providing as well that a MESBIC so chartered may be licensed by SBA to operate under the provisions of the SBI Act of 1958.

Section 203

Section 203 adds a new subsection (d) to section 302 of the SBI Act of 1958, providing that, notwithstanding the 50% limitation of subsection (b) (2) of this section or any other provision of law, shares of stock, other equity and debt securities issued by a MESBIC may be purchased by banks and other financial institutions, subject to the present limitation which prohibits bank ownership of the shares of SBICs in an aggregate amount exceeding 5 percent of a bank's capital and surplus. This allows whole or partial ownership of MESBICs by such banks and other financial institutions.

Section 204

Section 204 authorizes SBA, to the extent that the necessary funds are not available to the companies involved from private sources on reasonable terms, to purchase or to guarantee the payment of principal and interest on debentures issued by SBICs on such terms and conditions as SBA deems appropriate, and pledges the full faith and credit of the United States to the payment of all amounts required to be paid under any guarantee so issued. This strengthens SBA's authority to guarantee loans to SBICs, including the power to guarantee an SBIC debenture for the original amortization terms.

Section 205

Section 205 amends subsection 304(a) of the SBI Act of 1958 to authorize SBICs to invest in unincorporated as well as incorporated business concerns.

Section 206

Section 206 deletes from subsection 305(b) of the SBI Act of 1958 the present 90 percent limitation on SBIC deferred participation in loans to small business concerns. This amendment authorizes 100 percent SBIC guarantees on loans made to small concerns by other lenders.

Section 207

Section 207 provides that Title II of the bill may be referred to as the "Small Business Investment Act Amendments of 1970."

TITLE III

Section 301

Section 301 establishes a program of surety bond guarantees by authorizing SBA, upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, to guarantee and enter into commitments to guarantee any surety against loss as the result of the breach of the terms of a bid bond, payment bond, or performance bond by a principal on any contract up to $500,000 in amount. Authority for the program is incorporated into title IV of the Small Business Investment Act of 1958, which title presently specifies SBA's lease guarantee authority; and funding for the program is provided by the revolving fund already established by that title. A guarantee or commitment to guarantee under this program is only to be available (1) where the principal is a small business concern; (2) where such bond is required in order for the small concern to bid on a contract, or to serve as a prime contractor or subcontractor thereon; (3) where such concern is not able to obtain the required bond on reasonable terms and conditions without such a guarantee as this section provides; (4) where SBA determines that such concern will be able to perform the contract with respect to which the bond is required; (5) where the contract meets requirements established by SBA for feasibility of successful completion and reasonableness of cost; and (6) where the terms and conditions of any bond guaranteed are found to be reasonable. A contract of guarantee under this section obligates SBA to pay to the surety 90 percent of the loss which he incurs in fulfilling the terms of his contract because of the principal's breach of a bid bond, payment bond, or performance bond. The section also provides that SBA shall fix such uniform annual fees as it deems reasonable and necessary for guarantees issued under this section, and shall also fix uniform fees for the processing of applications for guarantees.

Section 302

Section 302 provides that title III of the bill may be referred to as the "Surety Bond Assistance Act of 1970".

THE HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

(Mr. WIDNALL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced H.R. 16643, the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1970. This is the administration bill and the following is the section-by-section summary of the proposed act:

TITLE I—MORTGAGE CREDIT

Section 101—The Mortgage Credit Assistance Act

This section would provide a new "Mortgage Credit Assistance Act" (MCAA) which would supersede the National Housing Act (NHA). No additional insurance could be written pursuant to the NHA after the effective date of the new Act. The new Act would: (1) consolidate the numerous authorities scattered throughout the National Housing Act into a minimum number of broad, flexible programs, (2) eliminate obsolete or duplicatory authorities, and (3) improve existing operations and subsidy programs.

Structure of the Act

Home mortgages would be insured under two authorities—unassisted (section 401 of the MCAA) and assisted (section 402). Multifamily mortgages would also be divided into one unassisted (section 501) and one assisted (section 502) authority. These four authorities would replace nearly 40 existing programs. Three existing programs covering hospitals, group practice facilities, nursing homes and intermediate care facilities would be provided for in one mortgage insurance program for health facilities (section 503). The Title X Land Development Program (section 505) would be retained but without a new communities component. One Supplemental Loan Program (section 504) would consolidate three existing programs. The Home Improvement and Mobile Home Program (Title III) would be retained but in simplified form. The various provisions spread throughout the National Housing Act relating to insurance funds, payment of insurance benefits, premiums and similar items would be clarified and consolidated in the new MCAA.

TITLE I—GENERAL AUTHORITY

Section 1—Definitions

This section would define "first mortgage", "mortgagee", "mortgagor", "home mortgage", "project mortgage", "maturity date", "condominium", "experimental property", "State", and "Secretary", in substantially the same way these terms are used in the National Housing Act. In addition, the term "advances" would be defined to permit "advances" of insured mortgage proceeds during construction or rehabilitation of projects to cover the cost of materials and building components which are located off-site but which will ultimately become part of the mortgaged property. No statutory authority presently exists for financing the purchase of off-site materials through insured mortgage advances.

Section 2—General insurance authority

This section would give the Secretary general authority to insure mortgages and loans under this Act and would establish conditions to be satisfied prior to issuance of such insurance.

Subsection (a) is based on the provisions contained in section 203 of the National Housing Act and would require that a mortgage insured under the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act be made to, and held by, a mortgagee approved by the Secretary as responsible and able to service the mortgage properly.

Subsection (b) would provide general authority for the Secretary to insure and make commitments to insure mortgages and loans. The Secretary could, prior to final endorsement for insurance, amend the amount of any commitment consistent with limitations on the maximum mortgage amount for the particular class of mortgage and loan involved (under existing law—sec. 515 of the National Housing Act, the amended amount must be eligible under provisions in effect at the time of the original commitment rather than at the time of final endorsement).

Subsection (c) would require that a mortgage transaction eligible for insurance under the Act be determined by the Secretary to be an "insurable risk", except that mortgage transactions involving assistance payments, experimental property, property located in an older, declining area, or single-family housing for employees of research or development installations could be accepted for insurance by the Secretary as a "special risk".

Section 3—Flexible mortgage amounts

This section would provide, in lieu of the various statutory dollar limitations on maximum mortgage amounts contained in the National Housing Act (e.g. sections 203, 207, 221, etc.) a flexible formula to be used by the Secretary in periodically establishing maximum mortgage amounts for home and multifamily mortgages insured under the Act. With respect to multifamily projects, the mortgage limits established pursuant to this section would be per unit limitations. There would be no overall dollar limit on project mortgage amount. (Sections 207, 221, etc. presently contain both a per unit and per project maximum insurable mortgage amount).

Subsection (a) would limit the insurance of any mortgage under the subsidized homeownership and rental programs (sections 402 and 502 of the Act) to properties the cost of which does not exceed by more than 10 percent the "development cost" established by the Secretary for the "housing market area" in which the property covered by the mortgage is located. For multifamily structures, the limitation on mortgage amount would be based on the sum of the development cost figures applicable to the various sized units in the project and would be applicable only to that part of the mortgage attributable to the portion of the property to be used for dwelling use.

Subsection (b) would provide for the establishment by the Secretary of the "development cost" for different sized homes and multifamily dwelling units in each housing market area. The "development cost" would be determined by establishing for each housing market area the "total construction cost" of a standard-sized new single-family home (and a standard-sized dwelling unit in a new multifamily structure) based on plans and specifications drawn for modest dwellings suitable for occupancy by persons receiving homeownership or rental assistance under section 402 and 502 of the Act and of a quality consistent with property and design standards acceptable in the area. On the basis of these determinations of total construction cost for the standard-sized home (and standard-sized dwelling unit in a multifamily structure) the Secretary would establish the total construction cost of varying sized dwellings (i.e., more or fewer bedrooms). The total construction cost of the various sized dwellings would then be increased by the same percentage which the average cost of land and site improvements in the area bears to the total construction cost for similar sized homes and multifamily units in the area.

For example, if the estimated total construction cost of a prototype unit in housing area "X" is $14,000 and the average ratio of land cost to construction cost for a house of comparable size in the area is 25 percent, the development cost would equal:

Development cost: Construction cost times average land cost ratio ($14,000 times 1.25) equals $17,500.

The maximum insurable assisted (section 402) single-family home mortgage would be:

Maximum insurable assisted mortgage: Development cost times 1.10 ($17,500 times 1.10) equals $19,250.

Maximum insurable unassisted mortgage: Development cost times 2.00 ($17,500 times 2.00) equals $35,000.

Subsection (c) would define (1) "total construction cost" to mean those cost items which are includable in a home or multifamily mortgage insurable under the Act except the costs of land and site improvement, and (2) "housing market area" as a contiguous geographical area in which the Secretary determines that the cost of materials, labor and other construction cost expenses are generally similar.

Subsection (d) would provide for periodic revisions by the Secretary of total construction or development cost estimates in any area on the basis of available cost data or for a redetermination of cost estimates for all areas where there has been a material change in property standards or for other reasons. The development cost figures established for each area pursuant to this section would become effective upon the date of their publication in the Federal Register.

Section 4—Interest rates

This section would authorize the Secretary to establish interest rates consistent with market conditions on all mortgages and loans insured under this Act. Authority would also be given to the Secretary to assure that discounts and settlement costs are equitable for all parties involved.

Subsection (a) would give the Secretary permanent authority to prescribe maximum interest rates for insured mortgages and loans based on his determination of the needs of the mortgage or loan market. These rates could differ for each of the different types of mortgages or loans which would be insured under the various sections of the Act and could further take into account differences in repayment requirements within each provision. The Secretary presently has temporary authority to set maximum interest rates on FHA-insured mortgages and loans (this authority is to expire on October 1, 1970; section 3(a) of Public Law 90–301).

Subsection (b) would permit the collection of a discount by the mortgagee from the mortgagor, builder, seller or any other person or entity connected with the transaction. The amount to be collected from each would be determined on the basis of negotiation between the parties. The mortgagee would be required to report to the Secretary the amount collected from each party. Under the current interpretation of the National Housing Act, the mortgagor is generally not permitted to be charged discounts which serve the purpose of increasing the yield on a mortgage.

Subsection (c) would require the Secretary to prescribe standards, based on a determination of reasonable charges, governing the amounts of settlement costs payable by mortgagors in connection with housing financed with mortgages insured under the Act, with a view to accumulating experience leading to legislative recommendations to reduce settlement costs and standardize these costs for all areas.

Section 5—Water and sewer facilities

This section which is similar to section 522 of the National Housing Act would require that there be adequate public or community water and sewerage facilities serving newly constructed housing except where it is determined that the establishment of a public or adequate community system is not economically feasible and the Secretary determines that the absence of such a system will not create a significant environmental hazard.

For the purposes of this section, the determination of economic feasibility is to be made without regard to whether the establishment of the particular type of system is authorized by law or is subject to approval by one or more local governments or public bodies.

Section 6—Approval of technically suitable materials

This section, which is based on section 521 of the National Housing Act, would require the Secretary to adopt a uniform procedure for the acceptance of materials and products to be used in structures approved for mortgages and loans insured under the Act.

Section 7—Insurance contract incontestability

This section, which is similar to existing provisions of the National Housing Act (e.g. 203), would establish the incontestability of an insurance contract in the hands of an approved mortgagee from the date of its execution, except for fraud or misrepresentation on the part of such mortgagee.

TITLE II—INSURANCE FUNDS, PREMIUMS AND CHARGES

Section 201—Insurance funds

This section, which is similar to sections 519 and 238(b) of the National Housing Act, would provide that all insurance obligations incurred pursuant to the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act be assigned to two insurance funds—the General Insurance Fund and the Special Risk Insurance Fund. Premiums under the General Insurance Fund would be fixed on an actuarially sound basis. Premiums under the Special Risk Insurance Fund would correspond to those established for the General Insurance Fund but would not have to be fixed on actuarially sound basis. No provisions permitting a distribution of surplus premiums would be included in the MCAA.

All mortgages and loans insured pursuant to provisions of the NHA which were obligations of the General Insurance Fund would continue to remain assigned to the General Insurance Fund (which would be carried over into the MCAA). In addition, all mortgages and loans insured under the MCAA as "insurable risks" (i.e. actuarially sound) would become obligations of the General Insurance Fund.

All mortgages and loans insured pursuant to the provisions of the NHA which were obligations of the Special Risk Insurance Fund would continue to remain obligations of the Special Risk Fund (which would be incorporated into the MCAA). In addition, all mortgages and loans insured under the MCAA as "special risks" would become obligations of the Special Risk Insurance Fund. Mortgages covering experimental property and single-family housing for employees of research and development installations would, unlike existing law, be obligations of the Special Risk Insurance Fund (under existing law these mortgages are obligations of the General Insurance Fund).

The Mutual Insurance Fund (section 202 of the NHA) which was assigned obligations insured under section 203 of the NHA, and the Cooperative Management Housing Fund which was assigned mortgages insured under section 213 of the NHA would continue to service such obligations but would not be carried over into the MCAA.

Subsection (a) would provide that in addition to those insurance obligations incurred pursuant to the National Housing Act, the General Insurance Fund also be used to carry out the insurance obligations with respect to (1) property improvement and mobile home loans insured under title III of this Act, (2) home and project mortgages insured under sections 401, 501, 503, and 505 (except as provided in Subsection (b)), and (3) supplemental project loans insured under section 504 where the original project mortgage is an obligation of the General Insurance Fund.

Subsection (b) would provide that in addition to those insurance obligations incurred pursuant to the National Housing Act, the Special Risk Insurance Fund also be used to carry out the insurance obligations with respect to (1) home and project mortgages involving assistance payments under sections 402 and 502, (2) home and project mortgages insured under sections 401, 501, and 503 where the mortgage involves experimental property or property located in an older, declining area, and (3) supplemental project loans insured under section 504 where the original project mortgage is an obligation of the Special Risk Insurance Fund.

Subsection (c) would provide that income received or expenses incurred in connection with the insurance of mortgages or loans be credited or charged to the fund obligated for such insurance.

Subsection (d), which is similar to provisions in section 520 of the National Housing Act would authorize the Secretary to borrow from the Treasury from time to time such amounts as he determines are necessary to make cash insurance payments, in lieu of payments in debentures.

Subsection (e) would allow moneys in an insurance fund which were not needed for current operations to be invested in obligations of, or guaranteed by, the United States, or in debentures which are the obligation of the particular fund.

Subsection (f) would authorize repayable advances from one insurance fund to the other (under the National Housing Act, a $20 million advance is authorized from the General Insurance Fund to the Special Risk Insurance Fund).

Subsection (g) would authorize the appropriation of such sums as may be needed to cover losses sustained by either insurance fund (under the National Housing Act appropriations are authorized only with respect to losses sustained by the Special Risk Insurance Fund).

Section 202—Insurance premiums and charges

This section would give the Secretary authority to establish insurance premiums and set certain payment conditions on such premiums for mortgages and loans insured under this Act.

Subsection (a), which is based on provisions contained in sections 203(c), 207(d), 2(f), and 1008 of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to establish insurance premiums. (Unlike existing law, no maximum or minimum insurance premium would be prescribed). The Secretary could require payment of the insurance premium either on an advanced or deferred payment basis, except that payment in advance would be required with respect to premiums for a project mortgage or loan or home improvement or mobile home loan.

Subsection (b), which incorporates provisions contained in sections 203(c) and 207(e) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary, in his discretion, to collect an adjusted premium charge in the event a home or project mortgage were prepaid, but not to exceed the amount of premium that would have been paid if the mortgage were held to maturity.

Subsection (c), which is based on provisions contained in section 229 of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to terminate any insurance contract upon request of the mortgagor and the mortgagee, and to require the payment of a termination charge computed in the same manner as an adjusted premium charge.

Subsection (d), which is based on provisions contained in section 203(c) of the National Housing Act, would permit payment of premiums and charges under this section to be either in cash or in debentures of the insurance fund to which the premium is to be credited.

Subsection (e), which incorporates the provisions of section 222 of the National Housing Act, would require the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of Transportation (in the case of a member of the Coast Guard) to pay the mortgage insurance premiums in the case of a mortgage on a single family dwelling or a one-family unit in a condominium, insured under section 401, during such time as the mortgagor was a serviceman. These payments would continue for a maximum of two years on behalf of a widow of a serviceman who died while on active duty.

Section 203—Processing fees and service charges

This section would provide the Secretary with specific authority to require payment by both the mortgagee and mortgagor of certain expenses.

Subsection (a), which incorporates sections 203(a) and 207(d) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to charge the mortgagee processing, appraisal, inspection and other appropriate charges for the services rendered. Such charges would be payable in cash. Provisions in section 207(d) of the National Housing Act which limit charges for appraisal and inspection to an aggregate of not more than 1 percent of the original principal face amount of the mortgage are not included in subsection (a).

Subsection (b) would authorize the Secretary in the case of mortgages held by him or made payable to him to collect a service charge from the mortgagor in an amount not exceeding the applicable mortgage insurance premium.

TITLE III—INSURANCE FOR PROPERTY IMPROVEMENT AND MOBILE HOME LOANS

Section 301—Types of loans

This section would consolidate and simplify provisions of section 2(a) of the National Housing Act relating to eligibility for insurance of financial institutions making home improvement and mobile home loans.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Secretary to insure financial institutions against losses in making, advancing credit in connection with, or purchasing property improvement and mobile home loans.

Subsection (b) would make eligible for insurance home improvement loans for the purpose of repairing or improving existing structures or the building of new structures (including the repair or replacement of improvements damaged or destroyed by natural disasters) by the owner or a lessee under a lease expiring not less than six months after the maturity of the loan.

Subsection (c) would make eligible for insurance mobile home loans for the purpose of financing the purchase of a mobile home to be used by the owner as his principal residence.

Section 302—Loan terms

This section, which is based on section 2(b) of the National Housing Act, would establish the maximum dollar amounts and maturity of home improvement and mobile home loans.

Subsection (a) would require that a home improvement loan (1) involve an amount not in excess of $5,000, except that where the structure to be repaired includes two or more dwelling units the loan could not exceed $15,000 or an average amount of $2,500 per unit, and (2) have a maturity not exceeding seven years and thirty-two days, except where the loan involves the construction of a new structure for use in whole or in part for agricultural purposes.

Subsection (b) would limit a mobile home loan to an amount not in excess of $10,000 and require that it have a maturity not in excess of twelve years and thirty-two days.

Section 303—Refinancing

This section, which is similar to the last proviso of section 2(b) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to refinance and extend the maturity of any loan insured under the title, provided that the additional amount or term of the loan did not exceed the limitations prescribed in section 302.

Section 304—Prohibitions

This section, which is based on provisions contained in section 2(a)(iii) of the National Housing Act, would require the Secretary to prevent (1) the use of multiple loans which would result in outstanding loans, with respect to the same property, in an amount in excess of the dollar limits prescribed in section 302 for an individual loan, and (2) the insuring of home improvement loans involving new residential structures which have not been completed and occupied for at least six months. The Secretary would be authorized to waive the prohibitions in (2) above.

Section 305—Property standards

This section would authorize the Secretary to restrict the type of products and services which qualify for insured home improvement loans and would establish property standards for mobile homes.

Subsection (a), which is based on provisions contained in section 2(a)(ii) of the National Housing Act, would direct the Secretary to periodically declare products or repairs which do not improve the basic livability or utility of properties or are especially subject to selling abuses ineligible for financing under this title.

Subsection (b), which is based on provisions contained in the last sentence of section 2(a) of the National Housing Act, would direct the Secretary to (1) prescribe minimum property standards for mobile homes and the sites on which they are to be located, and (2) obtain assurances from the borrower that the mobile home will be placed on a site meeting standards prescribed by the Secretary and any local zoning or other local requirements.

Section 306—Contract provisions

This section would limit the liability of the Secretary for any losses incurred on home improvement and mobile home loans and would establish conditions under which payment is final.

Subsection (a), which is based on the provisions contained in section 2(a) of the National Housing Act, would provide that the insurance obligation of the Secretary with respect to any lender not exceed either (1) 10 percent of the total amount of loans made by the lender (under this title and under Title I of the National Housing Act after July 1, 1939), or (2) 90 percent of the loss on any individual loan.

Subsection (b), which is based on provisions contained in section 2(g) of the National Housing Act, would make any payment for loss incontestable after two years in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation by the lender unless a demand for repurchase of the obligation on behalf of the United States has been made prior to the end of the two-year period.

Section 307—Waiver of requirements

This section, which is based on provisions contained in section 2(e) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to waive compliance with any regulation issued pursuant to this title if the lender has acted in good faith and enforcement would impose an injustice on him, but the waiver could not involve an increase in the amount of the Secretary's obligation.

Section 308—Transfer of insurance

This section, which is based on provisions contained in section 2(d) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to transfer the insurance of any loan to any approved lender which purchases such loan.

TITLE IV—HOME MORTGAGE INSURANCE

Section 401—Basic insurance program

This section would establish uniform criteria under which the Secretary could insure unassisted home mortgages. The separate insuring authorities for home mortgages contained in sections 203(b), 203(h), 203(i), 220, 221(d)(2), 222, 223(e), 233, 234(c) and 809 of the National Housing Act would be incorporated into this provision.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Secretary to insure unsubsidized home mortgages (covering a one- to four-family residence or a one-family unit in a condominium).

Subsection (b), which is similar to section 203(b) of the National Housing Act, would provide certain eligibility requirements for mortgages insured under this section:

(1) The principal obligation of the mortgage could not exceed 100 percent of $20,000 of the appraised value of the property, 90 percent of such value in excess of $20,000, and 80 percent in excess of $30,000. These loan-to-value ratios would be somewhat higher than those provided under the basic home mortgage provisions of the National Housing Act (sec. 203(b)). The Secretary could also include in the principal obligation of the mortgage an amount equivalent to discounts to be paid by the mortgagor. Closing costs which previously could be included in the principal obligation of the mortgage under section 203(b)(2) of the National Housing Act would not be includable under this provision. Provisions of section 203(b)(2) of the National Housing Act which provide for higher loan-to-value ratios for veterans, and prescribe lower loan-to-value ratios for new properties not approved prior to construction would not be carried forward into the section.

(2) The term of the mortgage could not exceed the lesser of 35 years or three-quarters of the remaining economic life of the property. The shorter mortgage term presently applicable to new properties not approved prior to construction (sec. 203(b)(3)) would be eliminated.

(3) The mortgage must require periodic payments which are not in excess of the mortgagor's ability to pay.

(4) The mortgagor would have to make a minimum downpayment in cash or its equivalent equal to closing costs (exclusive of prepaid expenses). A larger downpayment could be required by the Secretary. Under the provisions of section 203 of the National Housing Act, a downpayment of at least 3 percent of the acquisition cost is required to be paid by the mortgagor, except in the case of certain specified categories of mortgagors.

(5) The mortgage must contain such terms with respect to insurance, taxes, repairs, etc., as the Secretary provides.

Subsection (c), which is similar to section 234(c) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to establish such requirements as he finds necessary to protect the rights of owners of one-family units in a condominium.

Subsection (d) would require that the maximum principal obligation of a mortgage permitted under subsection (b) be reduced to 85 percent of that amount if the mortgagor is not the occupant of the property, except where (1) the mortgagor is in the military service and intends to occupy the property upon discharge (similar to section 216 of the National Housing Act), (2) the mortgagor and mortgagee agree to reduce the mortgage by 15 percent if the property is not sold to a purchaser who assumes the mortgage and occupies the property before the due date of the eighteenth amortization payment (similar to section 203(b)(8) of the National Housing Act), or (3) the mortgage covers experimental property and the Secretary waives the requirements of this subsection (similar to section 233 of the National Housing Act).

Subsection (e), which is similar to section 226 of the National Housing Act, would require that the mortgagor receive a written statement of the Secretary's appraisal of the value of the property prior to completion of the sale.

Subsection (f) would require a one-year warranty on new homes approved by the Secretary prior to construction protecting the mortgagor against substantial deviation from approved plans and specifications. A similar warranty is required for home mortgages insured under the National Housing Act (section 801 of the Housing Act of 1954). This subsection goes beyond the warranty required by section 801 of the Housing Act of 1954 in that it would require a builder to provide a one-year warranty against structural defects in new homes not approved prior to construction.

Subsection (g), which is based on provisions contained in section 203 of the National Housing Act would authorize the Secretary to consent to the release of a part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage.

Section 402—Homeownership for lower income families

This section, which is based on provisions contained in section 235 of the National Housing Act, would establish uniform criteria under which the Secretary could insure all subsidized home mortgages.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Secretary to contract to make periodic assistance payments on behalf of lower income homeowners to mortgagees holding mortgages insured under this section.

Subsection (b) would require that the assistance payments be made only during such time as the original mortgagor occupied the property but payments could be continued if the mortgage is assumed by an eligible homeowner if assistance payments had been made on behalf of the previous owner, or if the mortgage is assigned to the Secretary.

Subsection (c) would provide a formula for determining the amount of the assistance payment. The maximum assistance payment on behalf of any homeowner could not exceed (1) with respect to not less than 80 percent of the contract funds authorized by appropriation Acts, the difference between the monthly payment for principal, interest, and mortgage insurance premium due under the mortgage and the monthly payment for principal and interest due under a one percent mortgage (this is the maximum assistance payment for all homeowners under section 235 of the NHA), and (2) with respect to not more than 20 percent of the total amount of contract funds for assistance payments authorized by appropriation Acts the lesser of the monthly payment for principal, interest, and mortgage insurance premium due under the mortgage or 60 percent of the mortgagor's "monthly homeownership expense". This method of computing maximum assistance payments would be applicable only with respect to contract funds made available for use under this section (excluding funds made available for use under section 235 of the NHA).

The amount of assistance payment on behalf of any individual homeowner would equal, subject to the maximum assistance payment available on any mortgage, the balance of the mortgagor's "monthly homeownership expense" remaining unpaid after applying one-twelfth of the "homeowner's income contribution." The term "monthly homeownership expense" would be defined to include the monthly payment for principal, interest, mortgage insurance premium, insurance, and taxes due under the mortgage plus an amount attributable to the cost of utilities. The term "homeowner's income contribution" would be defined to mean an amount equal to the sum of 20 percent of that portion of the mortgagor's income which does not exceed $3500 plus 25 percent of that portion of the mortgagor's income in excess of $3500. (Under section 235 of the National Housing Act the mortgagor must contribute at least 20 percent of his income toward mortgage payments exclusive of utilities and maintained.)

For example, for a family of 4 with an annual income of $7,000 the homeowner's monthly contribution would equal:

Homeowner's Monthly Contribution: 1/12 ($3,500 × .20 + $3,500 × .25) equals 1/12 ($700 + $875) equals $131.24.

Subsection (d) would authorize the Secretary to reimburse the mortgagee for the additional expense involved in handling a mortgage insured under this section.

Subsection (e) would require the Secretary to provide for recertifications of the mortgagor's income at intervals of two years (or at shorter intervals where the Secretary deems it desirable) for purposes of adjusting the amount of assistance payments.

Subsection (f) would require the Secretary to assure that the sales price paid by the purchaser is not increased above the Secretary's appraised value of the property.

Subsection (g)(1) would provide contract authorizations not to exceed (for contracts entered into under this section and under section 235 of the National Housing Act) $75 million per year prior to July 1, 1969, which amount would be increased by $125 million on July 1, 1969, by $125 million on July 1, 1970, and by such amounts as may be necessary thereafter. This provision would make clear that these dollar limitations are applicable to contracts outstanding at any one time.

Subsection (g)(2) would provide that not more than 20 percent of the total amount of assistance payments authorized to be contracted to be made could be used for assistance payments to homeowners whose incomes at the time of their acquisition of the property exceeded 80 percent of the median income in the area (as determined by the Secretary and adjusted for family size), but such incomes could in no case exceed the median income for the area. The median income for any area would be deemed not to be less than 60 percent of the national median income. Annual reports to the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committees would be required with respect to the income levels of families assisted under this section. The existing income limits under section 235 of the NHA are 135 percent of public housing initial occupancy limits in the area and exception limits at 90 percent of the section 221(d)(3) BMIR limits for 20 percent of the contract funds.

Subsection (g)(3) would provide that 15 percent of contract funds authorized by appropriation Acts (for use under this section) could be contracted to be made with respect to existing housing. (Existing law authorizes a temporary 30 percent existing housing exception plus permanent specific exceptions).

Subsection (h) would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages under this section (including advances during rehabilitation where the mortgagor is the owner-occupant or where the property is constructed or rehabilitated pursuant to a self-help program) which meet the requirements of section 401 of this Act except as modified. The mortgage must involve a single-family dwelling or a one-family unit in a condominium or a single-family unit to be rehabilitated by the owner-occupant who meets eligibility requirements for a direct rehabilitation loan under section 312(a)(1) of the Housing Act of 1964. Unlike section 235 of the National Housing Act this provision would include in its coverage owner-occupied dwellings to be rehabilitated but would exclude the previously eligible cooperatives and the limited category of two-family dwellings. The provisions of section 235(j) (involving rehabilitation of properties by nonprofit organizations for subsequent sale to lower income purchasers) would be essentially provided for under this Act through a combination of the multifamily housing provisions of sections 501 and 502 and of this section.

The principal obligation of the mortgage could not exceed the appraised value of the property, or, in the case of rehabilitation by the owner-occupant, the sum of the estimated cost of rehabilitation and the amount required to finance existing indebtedness. The mortgagor would be required to make a payment of at least $200 in cash or its equivalent. Subject to the $200 downpayment, closing costs, prepaid expenses, and discounts paid by the mortgagor could be included in the mortgage (under existing law, homeowners eligible under the regular income limits are required to make at least a $200 downpayment and homeowners eligible under the exception income limits a downpayment of at least 3 percent of acquisition cost.

Subsection (i) would define income for purposes of this section as income from all sources of each member of the family in the household, but would give the Secretary discretion to exclude income earned by minors or income determined by him to be nonrecurring. In addition, a $300 deduction from income would be permitted for each minor in the household in excess of two, for purposes of computing the homeowner's income contribution. Section 235 of the National Housing Act would permit a $300 deduction for each minor in the household for all purposes.

Subsection (j) would direct the Secretary to transfer periodically part of the contract authority to the Secretary of Agriculture for use in rural areas and small towns.

TITLE V—PROJECT MORTGAGE INSURANCE

Section 501—Multifamily housing

This section would establish uniform criteria under which the Secretary could insure non-subsidized multifamily mortgages. The separate insuring authorities for multifamily non-subsidized mortgages in sections 207, 213, 221(d)(3) and (4), 231, 233, and 234 would be incorporated into this provision.

Subsection (a) would provide for four categories of multifamily housing; (1) rental projects, (2) cooperative projects, (3) projects in which the individual units are to be sold upon completion on a condominium or other basis, and (4) a mobile home court. The mortgage amount would be based on "replacement cost" of the project which would include, among other expenses, discounts to be paid by the mortgagor.

Subsection (b) would authorize the Secretary to regulate the mortgagor with respect to rates of return, capital structure and method of operation.

Subsection (c) would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages financing the construction of new multifamily projects and the rehabilitation, purchase or refinancing of existing multifamily projects.

Subsection (d) would provide that with respect to new construction the amount of the mortgage could not exceed 90 percent of the replacement cost (97 percent in the case of a cooperative mortgagor). Specific dollar limitations on the project or individual unit contained in the National Housing Act (e.g. sections 207, 213, 234) are not carried forward in this subsection.

Subsection (e) would provide that in the case of rehabilitation the amount of the mortgage not exceed 90 percent (97 percent for a cooperative) of the sum of the Secretary's estimates of the cost of rehabilitation and the value of the property before rehabilitation. If refinancing is also involved, the mortgage would be limited to the Secretary's estimates of the cost of rehabilitation and the amount required to refinance existing indebtedness.

Subsection (f) would provide that in the case of the purchase or refinancing of an existing project without rehabilitation, the mortgage amount not exceed 90 percent of the appraised value of the project (97 percent in the case of a cooperative).

Subsection (g) which is similar to section 207(c) of the NHA, would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages for mobile home courts up to $2500 per space, which amount could be increased up to 45 percent in high cost areas.

Subsection (h) would limit the mortgage amount for projects in which the units are to be sold to individual purchasers. The project mortgage could not exceed the sum of the individual mortgage amounts which could be insured for owner-occupants under title IV of the Act.

Subsection (i) which is similar to existing law (e.g. section 207 of the NHA), would authorize the Secretary to establish the maximum term of the mortgage.

Subsection (j), which is similar to provisions in the NHA, (e.g. 207(c)(3)) would authorize the Secretary to consent to a release of part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage.

Subsection (k) would require that a project contain at least 5 dwelling units or spaces in a mobile home court. Provisions of the NHA, (e.g. 207) which require that the dwelling units be self-contained living units are not carried forward in this subsection. The project would be required to be primarily residential but could include non-dwelling facilities adequate to serve the occupants and surrounding neighborhood (similar to section 236 of NHA but broader than section 207 of NHA). In addition, projects designed primarily for the elderly could include various health, dining and other service facilities.

Section 205—Multifamily housing for lower income tenants

This section, which is based on section 236 of the NHA, would establish uniform criteria under which the Secretary could insure all subsidized multifamily mortgages.

Subsection (b), which is similar to section 236(b) of the NHA, would require that the assistance payments be made only with respect to projects (1) covered by mortgages insured under this section or assigned to the Secretary, or (2) financed under a State or local program if the project is approved for receiving the benefits of this section by the Secretary prior to the completion of construction or rehabilitation.

Subsection (c) would provide for assistance payments with respect to two types of projects: (1) standard projects and (2) special projects.

With respect to at least 80 percent of the units in a standard project assistance payments to the mortgagee on behalf of the project owner could not exceed the maximum payments available under section 235(c) of the NHA—the difference between the monthly payment for principal, interest and mortgage insurance premium on a market rate mortgage and the monthly payment for principal and interest that would be due on a mortgage at one percent. With respect to the remaining 20 percent of the units in a standard project the assistance payments could equal the monthly payments for principal, interest and mortgage insurance premium due under the mortgage which are attributable to such units. In a special project, all units would qualify for the assistance payments equal to principal, interest and mortgage insurance premium. Not more than 20 percent of the total amount of contracts for assistance payments authorized by appropriation Acts could be made with respect to special projects.

Subsection (d) would authorize the Secretary to reimburse the mortgagee for its additional expenses in handling mortgages insured under this section.

Subsection (e) would require the Secretary to provide for recertification of tenant incomes at intervals of two years (or shorter intervals where the Secretary deems it desirable) and would require the project owner to comply with the Secretary's requirements as to tenant eligibility and rentals.

Subsection (f) would provide for the establishment of a "basic rental" for each unit in an assisted project determined on the basis of operating the project with the benefit of the assistance payments attributable to the unit. A tenant would pay the basic rental for his unit or such greater amount, not exceeding the fair market rental for such unit (the rental without subsidy), as represents his "income contribution" (defined in the same manner as under section 402 of the Act (homeownership assistance). (Under section 236 of the NHA, the tenant's contribution would equal 25 percent of his income). In any special project (where all basic rentals would be equal to the operating expenses attributable to the individual dwelling unit), the rental charged for any unit could be lower than the basic rental if the total amount of assistance payments available for the project is more than is needed to make up the difference between the aggregate of all the rents and the cost of running the project (i.e., to the extent that the rentals charged for some units in the project exceed the basic rentals for such units because of the tenant's income contribution).

Subsection (g) would require a project owner to pay to the Secretary any rentals charged in excess of the aggregate of the basic rental charges.

Subsection (h)(1) would provide contract authorizations not to exceed (for contracts entered into under this section and under section 236 of the NHA) $75 million per year prior to July 1, 1969, which amount would be increased by $125 million on July 1, 1969, and by $225 million on July 1, 1970, and by such sums as may be necessary thereafter. (Existing law authorizes an additional $125 million on July 1, 1970. The increase would reflect the termination of the rent supplement program and the use of this program for the same purposes.) This provision would make clear that these dollar limitations are applicable to contracts outstanding at any one time.

Subsection (h)(2) would provide that not more than 20 percent of contract funds could be used for assistance payments on behalf of tenants whose incomes at the time of the initial renting of the project exceeded 80 percent of the median income for the area (as determined by the Secretary and adjusted for family size), but such incomes could in no case exceed the median income for the area. The median income for any area would be deemed not to be less than 60 percent of the national median income. Annual reports to the Senate and House Banking and Currency Committee would continue to be required with respect to the income levels of tenants assisted under this section.

Subsection (h)(3) would authorize the use of up to 15 percent of contract funds with respect to existing properties (section 236 assistance is limited to new or rehabilitated projects and purchases of existing 236 projects by nonprofit or cooperative organizations).

Subsection (i) would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages under this section which meet the requirements of section 501 except as modified. The difference from section 501 is that nonprofit and cooperative mortgagors would qualify for 100 percent mortgages.

Subsection (j) would define "tenant" and "rental charge" as applicable to cooperatives.

Subsection (k) would define "income" as income from all sources of each member of the family in the household, but would give the Secretary discretion to exclude income earned by minors and income determined by him to be nonrecurring. In addition, a $300 deduction would be permitted for each minor in the household in excess of two for purposes of computing the tenant's income contribution. Section 236 would permit a deduction for each minor in the household for all purposes.

Section 503—Mortgage insurance for health facilities

This section, which is based on the provisions contained in sections 232 and 242 and title XI of the National Housing Act, would establish criteria under which the Secretary could insure all health facility mortgages.

Subsection (a) would define various terms used throughout the section. The terms "hospital", "nursing home" and "intermediate care facility" would be defined in substantially the same manner as under the National Housing Act (sections 232 and 242). The term "group practice facility" would be defined more broadly than it presently is in title XI of the National Housing Act to permit it to include proprietary groups as well as nonprofit organizations as eligible mortgagors.

Subsection (b) would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages which do not exceed $25 million for a hospital, $12,500,000 for a nursing home or intermediate care facility, and $5 million for a group practice facility. For new construction the permissible mortgage amount would not be permitted to exceed 90 percent of the estimated replacement cost, including equipment. In the case of rehabilitation, the mortgage could not exceed 90 percent of the cost of rehabilitation plus the appraised value of the property before rehabilitation (or if refinancing is involved, the mortgage would be further limited to the cost of rehabilitation and the amount required to finance existing indebtedness.

Subsections (c), (d), (f) and (g) of this section are substantially the same as provisions contained in section 232 and 242 and title XI of the National Housing Act which (1) establish the general types of hospitals, nursing homes and intermediate care facilities with respect to which mortgages could be insured, (2) authorize the Secretary, after consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare as to medical aspects of these facilities, to prescribe such regulations as are necessary to carry out the insurance program authorized by this section, (3) provide that hospitals insured pursuant to this section be encouraged to carry out comprehensive health programs for defined populations, (4) authorize the Secretary to release part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage, and (5) authorize the Secretary to insure combined nursing home and intermediate care facilities.

Section 504—Supplemental project loans

This section, which is based on the provisions contained in section 213(j), 223(d) and 241 of the National Housing Act, would establish criteria under which the Secretary could insure supplemental project loans.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Secretary to insure a supplemental loan for a multifamily or health facility project mortgage insured under the National Housing Act or the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act. This subsection would also make explicit the availability of such insurance for project mortgages held by the Secretary. A limited number of uninsured cooperatives which qualify for supplemental loan insurance under existing law (section 213(j)(1)) would continue to be eligible. Supplemental loans could be made: (1) to cover the operating losses of a project which during the first two years of operation has had costs exceed income; (2) to finance repairs, improvements, and additions to projects, and equipment for health facilities; and (3) to finance the purchase and resale of cooperative memberships provided that the downpayment of new members is at least equal to the original downpayment for such memberships.

Subsection (b) which is similar to section 223(d) of the National Housing Act would require that a loan covering operating losses not exceed in duration the unexpired term of the original mortgage and be limited in amount to the actual losses incurred by the project, as determined by the Secretary.

Subsection (c) which is similar to section 241 of the National Housing Act would establish requirements for a loan financing repairs, improvements, additions and equipment. (1) The amount of the loan would be limited to 90 percent of the estimated cost of the eligible items provided that the sum of the loan plus the outstanding balance on the original mortgage does not exceed the maximum mortgage limit prescribed by the section of the MCAA covering similar projects. The NHA (section 213(j)(2)(A)) permitted supplemental loans to cooperative projects (but not to any other projects) to be equal to 97 percent of the estimated value of eligible items. No supplemental loans under the MCAA could exceed 90 percent of the cost of eligible items). (2) The maximum maturity of the loan could not exceed the remaining term of the mortgage except that a supplemental loan with a maturity up to 10 years in excess of the outstanding mortgage term could be made for a limited class of uninsured cooperatives.

Subsection (d) would establish requirements for a loan to a cooperative to finance the purchase and resale of memberships. (1) The amount of the loan plus the outstanding balance remaining on the mortgage could not exceed the maximum mortgage limit prescribed by the section of the MCAA covering similar projects. Existing law (section 213(j)(2)(A)) limits the amount of the loan plus the outstanding mortgage amount to the principal balance of the original obligation of the mortgage. (2) The maturity of the loan could not exceed the remaining term of the mortgage.

Subsection (e) would authorize the Secretary to establish conditions and restrictions including the type of security required on supplemental loans.

Section 505—Mortgage insurance for land development

This section, which is based on the provisions contained in title X of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to insure land development mortgages. Existing provisions (section 1004) authorizing insurance for mortgages covering new community development would not be included.

Subsection (a) would define the terms "land development" and "improvements" in substantially the same manner as they are used in the National Housing Act (section 1001 (e) and (4), respectively).

Subsection (b) would establish certain conditions under which a land development mortgage could be issued. The mortgage could cover land to be developed and the improvements to be made, except that facilities intended for public use and in public ownership would be excluded. Any eligible party approved by the Secretary other than a public body could qualify as a mortgagor. The mortgage maturity would be 10 years but the Secretary would have discretion to establish a reasonable mortgage term for a privately owned system of water or sewage. The mortgage would contain such terms as the Secretary prescribed.

Subsection (c) would limit the principal obligation of the mortgage to the lesser of (1) 75 percent of the estimated value of the property upon completion of the development or (2) the sum of 50 percent of the estimated value of the land before the development plus 90 percent of the estimated cost of development.

Subsection (d) would authorize the Secretary to extend the maturity date or otherwise modify the terms of the mortgage.

Subsection (e) would require that the improvements comply with applicable State and local governmental requirements as well as minimum standards set by the Secretary.

Subsection (f), which is substantially similar to section 1003 of the National Housing Act, would establish certain conditions under which a land development project could be undertaken.

Subsection (g) would authorize the Secretary to adopt requirements for land development including encouragement of broad participation by small builders and a proper balance of housing for low and moderate income families.

Subsection (h) would require that public or private water and sewage systems consistent with existing or planned area systems be provided after development of the land.

Subsection (i) would authorize the Secretary to release or subordinate part or parts of the mortgaged property from the lien of the mortgage.

Section 506—Cost certification

This section, which is based on the provisions contained in section 227 and title XI of the National Housing Act, would establish requirements and procedures for the cost certification of various projects insured under the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act.

Subsection (a) would authorize the Secretary to adopt requirements for the certification of costs incurred in the construction or rehabilitation of multi-family housing, land developments or health facilities insured under the Act. The amount of the mortgage or loan at the time of final endorsement could not exceed the approved percentage of the estimated value of the land or property prior to construction or rehabilitation plus the actual cost of such construction or rehabilitation.

Subsection (b) would require the mortgagor to certify the actual costs of construction or rehabilitation. The Secretary could, in his discretion, require other parties involved in the transaction to certify the actual costs they have incurred with respect to the project or property. The Secretary could exempt from the requirements of this section (1) a mortgage covering a multi-family project designed for occupancy by less than 12 families, or (2) a mortgage of less than $250,000. Authority to exempt classes of property from the cost certification process did not exist under the NHA.

Subsection (c) would define various terms used in this section: (1) The term "approved percentage" would be defined in substantially the same manner as it is used in section 227(b) of the National Housing Act. "Approved percentage" is the percentage of estimated value, cost or replacement cost of a project or property which the Secretary is authorized to insure under the appropriate section of the MCAA except that "approved percentage" would be 100 percent for a mortgage which would finance repairs or rehabilitation of property if the proceeds were also not used for the purchase of the land or structure. (2) The term "actual cost" means the cost to the mortgagor of various improvements. Allowable expenditures which could qualify as actual costs could include labor, materials, construction contracts, land planning, engineers' and architects' fees, surveys, off-site public facilities, streets, organizational expenses, legal expenses, taxes and interest during construction, discounts and similar expenses allowed by the Secretary. If the mortgagor is also the builder or has an identity of interest with the builder, contractor or similarly interested party the term "actual cost" could include an allowance for profit. The NHA (section 227(c)) specified the percentage of profit allowed to a sponsor of a multi-family project. This subsection does not specify the profit allowable to a sponsor of such a project.

Section 507—Labor standards

This section, which simplifies and consolidates the provisions of section 212 of the National Housing Act, would require the payment of prevailing wages as determined by the Secretary of Labor with respect to the construction of multi-family housing (except housing with 11 or fewer units) health facilities and land development projects covered by mortgages insured under the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act. Existing provisions permitting a waiver of these requirements with respect to volunteer labor would be included.

TITLE VI—INSURANCE CLAIMS

Section 601—Home mortgage insurance claim settlement

This section, which is based on section 204(a) of the National Housing Act, would establish insurance claim settlement provisions governing the home mortgage programs.

Section 602—Forebearance of payments

This section, which is substantially similar to the seventh provision of section 204(a) of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to permit a mortgagee to extend the time for curing a default in a home mortgage, to extend the time for commencing foreclosure, or to approve a recasting of the terms of the mortgage.

Section 603—Acquisition of home mortgages to avoid foreclosure

This section, which is similar to section 230 of the National Housing Act, would permit the Secretary to accept an assignment of a home mortgage for the purpose of avoiding foreclosure and hardship to the homeowner. Where such assignment occurs, the mortgagee would be entitled to receive full reimbursement for the unpaid mortgage balance, any unpaid mortgage interest, and an allowance for costs incurred as a consequence of the default and assignment of the mortgage.

Section 604—Project mortgage insurance—claim settlement

This section, which is similar to sections 207(g) and (h) of the National Housing Act, would establish mortgage insurance claim settlement provisions applicable to project mortgages.

Section 605—Modifications in terms of project mortgages

This section, which is similar to section 239 of the National Housing Act, would provide that the Secretary could consent to any extension or modification of a mortgage covering multifamily housing only under and in conformity with regulations prescribed by him. Such regulations must provide that during the period of any such extension or modification the mortgagor will be required to place in trust any income from the project in excess of operating needs; except that the Secretary may consent to an extension or modification of a mortgage without regard to this requirement if he determines that it would not jeopardize the interests of the United States. Criminal penalties would be prescribed for the misuse of project income.

Section 606—Settlement of insurance claims with debentures

This section, which is based on the provisions in sections 204 and 207 of the National Housing Act, would establish the terms and conditions under which debentures are to be issued by the Secretary in the settlement of mortgage and loan insurance claims.

TITLE VII—MISCELLANEOUS

Section 701—General Authorization for Dealing with and Disposing of Property

This section which would consolidate into section 2, 204(g), 207 (1) and 208 of the National Housing Act, would provide authority to the Secretary for dealing with and disposing of property acquired in connection with the settlement of insurance claims.

Section 702—Acquisition of title by the Secretary

This section which is similar to section 207(h) and the last provision of section 204 of the National Housing Act would authorize the Secretary, in connection with a mortgage assigned to him, to acquire possession and title to the property by a voluntary conveyance in extinguishment of the mortgage debt or to institute foreclosure proceedings and prosecute such proceedings to conclusion. It also would authorize the Secretary to bid at a foreclosure sale of a mortgage held by him and to exercise all the rights of a mortgagee under such mortgage.

Section 703—Insurance for Mortgages Sold or Executed in Connection with the Sale of Property by the Secretary

This section, which is based on section 223(c) of the National Housing Act would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages sold by him or executed in connection with the sale of property by him. Such insurance is permitted to be made without being limited to the eligibility, insurance premium and settlement provisions of the Act.

Section 704—Expenditures to correct or compensate for structural defects in mortgaged homes and experimental property

This section would give the Secretary authority to take appropriate action where structural defects are found in homes or experimental property. Section 518 of the National Housing Act is incorporated into this provision. Subsection (a) (based on 518 (a)) would authorize the Secretary to make expenditures to correct structural defects or to pay the claim of the owner arising from such defects, or to acquire title to the property in which defects exist if the property involves a one- to four-family dwelling that has been approved for mortgage insurance prior to the beginning of construction and the owner requests assistance within 4 years after insurance of the mortgage. Subsection (b) which is similar to section 233(c) of the National Housing Act would authorize the Secretary to expend available funds to correct defects or failures (when he determines it necessary to protect the occupants) with respect to experimental property covered by an insured mortgage.

Subsection (c) (based on 518(b)) would empower the Secretary to issue regulations prescribing conditions under which he would make payments under subsection (a) and (b).

Section 705—Statistical and economic surveys

This section, which is similar to sections 209 and 233(d) of the National Housing Act, would direct the Secretary to make such statistical surveys, legal and economic studies and reports on improved housing technology as he considered appropriate to guide in the development of housing and the creation of a sound mortgage market.

Section 706—Penalties

This section, which is similar to section 512 of the National Housing Act, would authorize the Secretary to refuse the benefits of participation in any of the mortgage insurance programs prescribed in the Act to anyone who (1) knowingly violates a provision of the Act or of the law governing the Veterans Home Loan Guaranty Program, or (2) who violates a penal statute in connection with property assisted under such provisions, or (3) materially fails to properly carry out a contractual obligation with respect to the completion of construction of work financed with assistance under the Act or under the VA provisions.

Other provisions of title I

Section 102—Experimental dual interest rate system

This section would authorize the Secretary to insure mortgages under such sections as he deemed appropriate of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act at whatever interest rate was negotiated by the mortgagor and mortgagee, provided no discounts were collected. This authority would expire on October 1, 1972, and would provide an alternative to the interest rate administratively established by the Secretary.

Section 103—Rentals for low and moderate income projects

This section would amend section 221 of the National Housing Act to require that occupants of section 221 below-market-rate projects pay a rental not less than the tenant's income contribution (as defined in section 502(f)(2) of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act) up to the fair market rent. Any rentals collected in excess of those needed to operate the project would be periodically paid to the Government National Mortgage Association as holder of the mortgages. Tenant incomes would be reviewed at least once every two years. Any increase required in the rental for existing tenants would be delayed for at least one year and then applied in two steps.

Section 104—GNMA special assistance purchases

This section would amend section 302(b) of the National Housing Act to remove any limitations on the maximum mortgage amount which may be purchased by GNMA under its special assistance functions and to remove the prohibition on GNMA purchasing mortgages offered by or covering property held by a public body. In addition, this section would transfer $1.5 billion in special assistance authority from section 306(g) (congressional program for purchase of low-cost single-family home mortgages at par) to the Presidential authority under section 306(c) for use in purchasing a broader range of mortgages.

Section 105—Housing for the elderly

This section would amend section 202(a) of the Housing Act of 1959 to require that tenants of projects assisted with loans under that section pay a rental not less than the tenant's income contribution (as defined in section 502(f)(2) of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act) up to fair market rent. Tenant incomes would be reviewed at least once every two years. Any increased required in the rental for existing tenants would be delayed for at least one year and then applied in two steps. In addition, this section would prohibit the approval of new loans after the effective date of section 502 of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act (rental assistance program).

Section 106—Rent supplement program

This section would amend section 101 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1965 to prohibit new contracts for rent supplement payments to be entered into after the effective date of section 502 of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act.

Section 107—Exemption from State usury laws of FHA and VA loans

This section would exempt FHA insured and VA guaranteed mortgages and loans from the limitations on interest rates imposed by State or local usury laws.

Section 108—Authority of FNMA to deal in conventional mortgages

Subsection (a) would authorize the Federal National Mortgage Association, with the approval of the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, to purchase, and lend on the security of, conventional mortgages. Under existing law, FNMA is authorized only to purchase (or lend on the security of) mortgages or loans insured by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development or the Farmers' Home Administration or insured or guaranteed by the Veterans' Administration.

Because the conventional mortgages will not be insured or the credit of the mortgagor and value of the property examined by a Federal agency, safeguards would be provided against the sale of "inferior" mortgages to FNMA. The seller would be required either to retain an interest in the mortgages (at least a 10 percent participation) or agree to repurchase or replace the mortgage if it is in default within three years of the purchase. In addition, if the seller is required only to retain a participation in the mortgage, the mortgage could not be purchased by FNMA pursuant to a commitment entered into prior to the date the mortgage was originated.

Generally, mortgages eligible for purchase by FNMA would be required to have been originated within one year of the purchase date. However, up to 10 percent of the aggregate amount of conventional mortgages purchased by FNMA could be older mortgages purchased from sellers who were engaged in mortgage lending or investing activities at the time of the purchase. The principal obligation of any conventional mortgage could not exceed the dollar limitation on maximum mortgage amount in effect on the date the mortgage was originated which would be applicable to the mortgage if it were insured by the Secretary of Housing and Urban development.

Subsection (b) would exempt any liabilities that may be incurred by a national bank in connnection with the sale of conventional mortgages to FNMA from the limitations on the amount of indebtedness such bank is authorized to incur.

Section 109—Termination of insurance authority under National Housing Act

This section would rewrite section 217 of the National Housing Act to prohibit the insurance of mortgages and loans under that Act after the effective date of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act, except pursuant to commitments issued prior to that date.

TITLE II—PUBLIC RENTAL HOUSING AND HOMEOWNERSHIP ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Section 201—Revision to United States Housing Act of 1937

This section would extensively revise the United States Housing Act of 1937—the program of assistance to local public housing agencies in the provision of housing for low income families. The principal changes are:

Subsidy provisions would be clarified and simplified. The Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969 authorized the payment of annual contributions in excess of debt service requirements up to the statutory annual maximum—an amount equal to the capital cost of the project multiplied by the going Federal rate plus 2 percent. The revised Act perfects this amendment by making it explicit that this maximum subsidy is available to pay (a) the full principal and interest payments due on the debt outstanding on the project, and (b) the amount necessary to make up the difference between the rents actually collected from tenants and the operating costs (other than debt service costs) on all dwelling units in the project with respect to which the tenant's rent does not equal the operating cost of the unit he occupies. The subsidy for operating costs would be allocated on a needs basis to those individual units in the project housing the very poor whose rental payment cannot cover the operating costs allocable to the unit they occupy. The total amount of operating subsidy available for a project would be limited by the statutory formula—the going Federal rate plus 2 percent times the capital cost, less the amount needed for debt service, is the amount available for operating subsidy. The amount of operating subsidy available per unit in a project would depend upon the income distribution of tenants occupying all units in the project. If, for example, 50 of the 100 dwelling units in the project are occupied by families whose required rental does not cover the operating costs on their units, the average operating subsidy per unit could not exceed the total amount of operating subsidy available for the project divided by 50, the number of dwelling units with respect to which operating subsidy is needed. The actual amount of operating subsidy provided for each individual unit requiring operating subsidy could, of course, be higher or less than this amount. With these perfecting changes, the present authorization to pay an additional annual subsidy of up to $120 per dwelling unit occupied by a special category family is no longer required and would be eliminated.

Rents for dwelling units would be required to be fixed on a uniform basis. The existing provision of law authorizing local agencies to fix rents was enacted in the context of a maximum Federal subsidy which could not exceed project debt service requirements—that is subsidy was not provided to cover deficiencies between rental charges and local agency operating costs excluding debt service costs. The fixing of rents by local agencies is incompatible with the payment of subsidy for operating costs. Since the tenant rental charge constitutes the basis for the subsidy amount, it would in effect permit the local agency to control the amount of Federal subsidy. The uniform rent criteria contained in the revised Act, which requires that rents be based on a percentage of the tenant's income (between 20 and 25 percent), would assure that the operating subsidy made available is allocated on a uniform and equitable basis.

Uniform income limit criteria would be established for the program in lieu of present provisions which require individual income limit studies for each locality. The criteria provide that dwelling units may be made available for families whose incomes at the time of their initial occupancy does not exceed 80 percent of the median income for the area in which the dwelling units are located. A significant change included in the criteria would permit 20 percent of the dwelling units to be occupied by families whose income at initial occupancy does not exceed the median income for the area. This limited authorization to broaden the economic range of families served by the program is directed toward improving the quality of life in the low income housing environment. The new income criteria would also eliminate existing requirements for the establishment of income limits for continued occupancy which have proven undesirable from the standpoint of achieving an economic mix of families in housing developments and have contributed to family insecurity and instability.

A new public homeownership program would be established for low income families, which would permit individual low income families or an association formed by or for the benefit of such families to purchase newly developed housing as well as existing projects now operated as rental housing. Existing homeownership provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937 are ineffective because they provide insufficient subsidy to assist a low income family in acquiring ownership and the purchaser has to wait a long period before achieving homeowner status. The new program provides for conveyance of the property as soon as the family undertakes the obligation to purchase the property by executing a mortgage to the public housing agency. The family enjoys all the benefits of homeownership immediately. Subsidy is provided up to the full amount of principal and interest payable by the public housing agency with respect to the property. The purchaser's contribution for homeownership would be based on the same income formula as used for rental housing (between 20 and 25 percent of income) and would have to be sufficient to cover utilities, taxes, and insurance. He would also be required to take care of his own maintenance requirements.

Flexible dwelling unit construction and development cost limits would be established to replace the present fixed construction and equipment room cost limits which are difficult to relate to total development costs and have been largely ineffective in controlling costs. The construction cost per dwelling unit could not exceed by more than 10 percent the total construction cost established by the Secretary on the basis of uniform plans and specifications for each housing area. Total construction costs would have to constitute at least 65 percent of the total development cost, with other development costs such as land acquisition and site improvements limited to not more than 35 percent of the development cost. The 35 percent limitation on other development costs varies from the limit applicable to the private subsidized programs because of special factors which affect the cost of land and exterior improvements under the public program and because there are certain costs, such as the cost of nondwelling facilities and relocation payments, which are not includable under the private program.

The provision contained in subsection 15 (10) of the existing Act authorizing grants for tenant services and programs to public housing agencies would be deleted. Section 601 of the bill provides for the inclusion of this provision as a part of a broadened program of advice and assistance with respect to housing for lower income families under section 106 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968.

The revised Act would delete a number of obsolete provisions, such as the sections concerning the creation of a United States Housing Authority, the making of capital grants, and the disposal of Federal projects, and would make numerous technical amendments.

Section 1--Declaration of policy

This section amends the declaration of policy contained in section 1 of the existing Act to delete obsolete or unnecessary language. In this section and elsewhere in the revised Act the term "low income housing" is used in lieu of "low-rent housing."

Section 2—Definitions

This section would continue, with several important modifications, definitions contained in section 2 of the existing Act. The definition of "low income housing" in section 2(1) would amend the existing definition so as to delete the requirement that income limits and rents be fixed by the local public housing agency. Statutory income limit and rent criteria are prescribed in section 9 of the revised Act. The existing definition would also be modified to delete language which requires the establishment of income limits for continued occupancy in low income housing. Under the revised Act income limits are applicable at the time of admission, but families would not be required to move because of subsequent increases in income.

This section would also delete several terms, such as "slum" and "slum clearance" which are no longer pertinent to the program. A definition of "low income housing project" or "project" has been added to make it clear that the modernization or improvement of an existing low income housing project may constitute a separate project for purposes of assistance under the Act.

Section 3—Tax exemption of public housing agencies

This section is based on the provision contained in section 5(d) of the existing Act and provides that public housing agency obligations issued in connection with low income housing projects and the income from such projects shall be exempt from Federal taxes.

Section 4—Loans for low income housing projects

This section is based on the loan provisions contained in section 9 of the existing Act. The provision would be amended to require that loan contracts provide for the periodic revision of the interest rate on the balance outstanding on the loan based on the going Federal rate for each six-month period. This variable interest rate requirement is the same as the requirement now applicable to loans under the urban renewal program.

Section 5—Annual contributions for low income housing projects

This section is based on the annual contributions provisions contained in section 10 of the existing Act. It would amend the present section 10(a) so as to eliminate the authorization to pay an additional annual subsidy of up to $120 per dwelling unit occupied by an elderly or handicapped family, a displaced family, a very large family, or a family of unusually low income. The authorization contained in the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969 to pay subsidy in excess of debt service requirements up to the statutory annual maximum provides sufficient subsidy to bridge the gap between the rents which low income housing tenants can afford to pay and the full cost of the dwelling unit provided to that family. In addition, section 9 of this Act makes explicit the availability of subsidy (up to the statutory maximum) to bridge the gap between rents charged for a dwelling unit and the cost of providing that unit. The special category subsidies are no longer required.

Section 5(f) of the revised Act would amend the present section 10(g) and delete inconsistent and confusing provisions which encourage public housing agencies to establish admission policies which give preferential consideration to special categories of applicants.

Section 6—Amendment of contracts

This section is based on the provision contained in section 14 of the existing Act which authorizes the Secretary to consent to the modification, with respect to rate of interest, time of payment of any installment of principal or interest, security, amount of annual contribution or any other term of any contract or agreement to which the Secretary is a party, subject to specific limitations contained in the Act. It also authorizes the Secretary to amend annual contributions contracts so that the going Federal rate on which annual contributions are based may be established as the going Federal rate at the time of the contract amendment.

Section 7—Contract requirements

This section is based on the provisions contained in section 15 of the existing Act concerning provisions to be included in contracts for loans and annual contributions and related contract requirements. These include provisions for local governing body approval of projects, cooperation agreements, and relocation payments for those displaced by low income housing projects.

Subsection 7(2) would abolish the statutory dollar limits on construction costs per room now contained in section 15(5) and replace them with flexible limits based on the total construction costs per dwelling unit which are includable in a home mortgage or multifamily mortgage assisted under the new section 402 and 502 private subsidized homeownership and rental programs. The construction cost per dwelling unit on which the computation of any annual contributions may be based could not exceed by more than 10 percent the appropriate total construction cost established by the Secretary on the basis of uniform plans and specifications for each housing cost area. This subsection would also establish a limitation on total development cost by requiring that the total construction cost constitute at least 65 percent of total development costs, with other development costs, such as land acquisition and site improvements, to constitute not more than 35 percent of the development cost.

Section 8—Low income housing in private accommodations

This section is based on the provision contained in section 23 of the existing Act which authorizes public housing agencies to provide low income housing in private accommodations under a leasing arrangement. This section would amend existing law by deleting the provision which requires local governing body approval before the section 23 program may be used in a locality. It would also amend the present section 23(g) provision concerning the sale of leased units to tenants so as to authorize such sales under the terms and conditions applicable to the new public homeownership program which would be authorized by section 10 of the revised Act.

Section 9—Occupancy of low income housing

This section is a new section which establishes statutory income limit and rent criteria which are compatible with those applicable to the private rental assistance program which would be authorized under section 502 of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act. Under present law, public housing agencies fix income limits and rents subject to the approval of the Secretary.

Subsection 9(a) provides that low income housing dwelling units may be made available to families whose incomes at the time of their initial occupancy does not exceed 80 percent of the median income as determined by the Secretary, with standard percentage adjustments for small and large families, for the area in which the dwelling units are located. However, not more than 20 percent of existing low income housing units, and not more than 20 percent of the additional units provided after enactment of the legislation, could be occupied by families whose incomes at the time of their initial occupancy does not exceed the adjusted median income for the area. Public housing agencies would retain authority to fix income limits within this statutory maximum. The requirement in the present section 10(g)(3) for the establishment of maximum income limits for continued occupancy in low income housing would be eliminated.

Subsection 9 (b) and (c) require that rents be fixed on a uniform basis in the low income housing program. The public housing agency would be required to establish the actual cost—the operating expenses as well as the debt service charge attributable to a dwelling unit—of providing a dwelling unit to a family. A basic rental charge would be established for each dwelling unit in an amount equal to the operating expenses (excluding debt service charge) attributable to the dwelling unit. The monthly rental charged a tenant family could not exceed one-fourth of the family's income and would be the greater of (1) the basic rental charge or (2) one-twelfth of the "tenant's income contribution"—an amount determined by adding 20 percent of that portion of the tenant's income which is below $3,500, and 25 percent of that portion of the tenant's income which exceeds that amount. However, the rental charge could not exceed an amount equal to one-twelfth of the "tenant's income contribution" for those dwelling units with respect to which the Secretary has contracted to pay an operating subsidy to make up the difference between the basic rental charge and the rental collected from the tenant. The monthly rental for any dwelling unit could not exceed a fair market rental charge based on the actual cost of providing the dwelling unit including the debt service charge attributable to the unit.

Subsection 9(d) would provide that in determining income for purposes of eligibility and determining the "tenant's income contribution" under this section and the "homeowner's income contribution" under the new section 10 homeownership program, income from all sources of each member of the family in the household shall be included, except that the Secretary may in his discretion exclude income of minors and any nonrecurring income. It also provides that in determining income for purposes of rent and allocation of income for homeownership, there shall be deducted an amount equal to $300 for each minor person in the family's household in excess of two.

Section 10—Homeownership for low income families

This section would authorize a new public homeownership program for low income families.

The new homeownership program would permit low income families and public housing tenants, or an association formed by or for the benefit of such families or tenants, to purchase newly developed or acquired housing, as well as existing projects now operated as rental housing. Individual homes and dwelling units or entire projects could be purchased.

The program which would be authorized by section 10 provides for conveyance of the property to the low income family as soon as it undertakes the obligation to purchase the property by executing a mortgage to the public housing agency. The family would enjoy all the benefits of homeownership immediately, just as in the private homeownership assistance program.

The maximum subsidy for the homeownership program would be the same as the debt service subsidy provided for with respect to the public housing rental projects—that is, the subsidy could not exceed the amount of principal and interest payable by the public housing agency with respect to the mortgaged property.

The amount of income which the purchaser would be required to allocate for homeownership would be the greater of (1) an amount equal to all monthly homeownership expenses except principal and interest—that is, the monthly amounts due for taxes and insurance and an amount attributable to the cost of utilities or (2) one-twelfth of the "homeowner's income contribution"—an amount determined by adding 20 percent of that portion of the purchaser's income which is below $3,500, and 25 percent of that portion of his income which exceeds that amount. If the purchaser makes the required allocation of income and otherwise fulfills his mortgage obligations, his mortgage would be amortized as if he were making full principal and interest payments.

In the case of newly developed or acquired property the amount of the purchaser's mortgage would be equal to the amount of the debt incurred by the public housing agency in producing or acquiring the housing and the mortgage would provide for amortization over the same period of time. The amount of the mortgage for the purchase of existing public housing would be an amount equal to the public housing agency's outstanding debt on the property or its appraised value, whichever is greater. Where the mortgage amount is based on appraised value, the mortgage would provide for an amortization period satisfactory to the Secretary which would extend beyond the remaining term on the public housing agency's debt. The purchaser's mortgage would provide for an interest rate based on the rate then applicable to mortgages insured under the private homeownership program authorized by section 402 of the Mortgage Assistance Act.

Section 11—General powers of the Secretary

This section is based on the provisions contained in section 13 of the existing Act concerning the Secretary's power to foreclose on property and to acquire or take possession of any project which he previously owned or in connection with which he has made a loan or annual contribution.

The section also contains a provision in section 17 of the existing Act which makes the budget program and audit requirements of the Government Corporation Control Act applicable to the low income housing program.

Section 12—Labor standards

This section is based on the labor standards provision now in subsection 16(2) of the existing Act which requires that contracts include a provision that laborers and mechanics employed in the development of a low-income project be paid not less than the wages prevailing in the locality as predetermined by the Secretary of Labor pursuant to the Davis-Bacon Act and that they be compensated at a rate not less than one and one-half times the basic rate of pay for hours in excess of 8 hours in any workday or 40 hours in the workweek.

Section 13—Financial provisions

This section is based on the financial provisions in sections 19, 20, and 21 of the existing Act. It authorizes the Secretary to issue and have outstanding at any one time notes and other obligations for purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount which shall not, unless authorized by the President, exceed $1.5 billion. It also contains provisions concerning the availability of receipts and assets for purposes of the program and the use of Federal Reserve Banks as depositories, custodians, and fiscal agents.

Section 14—Private financing

This section is based on the provisions now in section 22 of the existing Act which are designed to facilitate the enlistment of private capital through the sale of bonds and other obligations by public housing agencies.

Section 15—Severability clause

This section provides that if any provision of the revised Act is held invalid, the remainder of the Act will not be affected thereby.

Section 16—Short title

This section provides that the revised Act may be cited as the United States Housing Act of 1937.

Section 202—Applicability of rental requirement

This section would provide for the deferred implementation of the new rental criteria prescribed in section 9 of the revised United States Housing Act of 1937 in the case of any family now occupying a public housing unit whose rent would be increased. In such cases, the required rental increase would become effective in two increments—(1) an increase equal to one half the amount of additional rent at the time the public housing agency makes the first review of the family's income (other than an interim review) which occurs at least one year after the effective date of the title, and (2) the family's rent would be increased to the full amount of the rental charge required under section 9 when the public housing agency makes its next review of the family's income. The revised Act requires public housing agencies to review family income at intervals of two years.

TITLE III—URBAN REDEVELOPMENT

Section 301—Authorization for urban renewal

This section would amend section 103(b) of the Housing Act of 1949 to increase the aggregate amount of capital grants which may be made under the urban renewal program after June 30, 1971, by such sums as may be necessary.

Section 302—Early closeout of urban renewal projects

This section would amend section 106(1) of the Housing Act of 1949 to authorize the Secretary, in cases where urban renewal project land intended for private reuse cannot be disposed of in the near future due to circumstances beyond the local public agency's control, to compute the net project cost and closeout the project at no additional cost to the locality. The locality would receive an additional grant equal to one-third (or one-fourth) of the estimated proceeds from the undisposed of land. When such land is subsequently disposed of in accordance with the urban renewal plan the net proceeds realized would be paid to the Secretary. Under existing law early project closeout is only permitted where 5 percent or less of project land remains unsold.

Section 303—Expenses in connection with the sale of federal surplus lands to local urban renewal agencies

This section would amend section 108 of the Housing Act of 1949 to permit the Secretary to charge against the gross proceeds realized any property management or other expenses he incurs when Federal surplus property is transferred to him for sale to a local urban renewal agency. Under existing law all the proceeds from such a transfer and sale must be deposited into the Treasury.

Section 304—Interim assistance program

This section would amend section 118 of the Housing Act of 1949 to remove the present statutory $15 million limit on interim assistance grants in any one year.

Section 305—Rehabilitation loans

This section would amend section 312 of the Housing Act of 1964 to (1) delete the requirement which requires, for residential rehabilitation loans, that a preference be given to persons whose annual incomes are within the locally applicable income limits for the section 221(d)(3) below market interest rate program, (2) require that the applicant must be unable to secure funds from other sources upon "reasonable" terms and conditions rather than upon "comparable" terms and conditions as in existing law, (3) provide that the term of the loan may not exceed the lesser of thirty years (twenty years under existing law) or three-fourths of the remaining economic life of the structure after rehabilitation, (4) provide that the loan shall bear interest at the maximum rate established by the Secretary, at the time the loan is approved, for mortgages insured under section 402 of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act (homeownership assistance for lower income families). Loans to owner-occupants of residential property, however, may bear interest at such rate, not less than three percent annually, as the Secretary determines to be necessary to enable the applicant to amortize the loan as part of his monthly housing expense without having such housing expense exceed 25 percent of the applicant's average monthly income. (Under existing law rehabilitation loans shall bear interest at such rate as the Secretary determines to be appropriate but not to exceed 3 percent per annum.), (5) provide, in the case of residential property, that the amount of the loan may not exceed the lesser of (1) the maximum mortgage amount which could be insured under section 402 of the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act for the area multiplied by the number of dwelling units to be rehabilitated (as determined pursuant to section 3 of such Act); or (2) the estimated cost or rehabilitation plus, where the Secretary approves refinancing, the amount required to refinance existing indebtedness secured by the property. In all cases, however, the amount of the loan shall be limited to an amount which, when added to any outstanding indebtedness, creates a total outstanding indebtedness, which does not exceed (1) in the case of owner occupied property, 97 percent of the first $15,000 and 90 percent of any amount over $15,000 of the estimated cost of rehabilitation plus the Secretary's estimate of the value of the property before rehabilitation; (2) in the case of property which is not owner occupied, 90 percent of the sum of the estimated cost of rehabilitation plus the Secretary's estimate of the value of the property before rehabilitation. (Under existing law the amount of a rehabilitation loan may not exceed, in the case of residential property, the amount of a loan which could be insured under section 220(h) of the National Housing Act.)

These amendments would only be effective with respect to loan commitments entered into on or after the effective date of this section.

Section 306—Authorization for model cities

This section would amend section 111 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966 to authorize after June 30, 1971, appropriations for supplementary grants for the model cities program of such sums as may be necessary. Amounts appropriated would remain available until expended and any amounts authorized for any fiscal year but not appropriated may be appropriated for any succeeding fiscal year.

TITLE IV—METROPOLITAN DEVELOPMENT

Section 401—Open space land programs

This section would rewrite title VII of the Housing Act of 1961 (grants for open space land, urban beautification and historic preservation) to authorize a single program of grants for (1) acquisition of title to, or other interests in, open space land in urban areas and (2) the development of open space or other land in urban areas for open space uses (including historic preservation).

Section 701 of the amended title would restate basic Congressional findings and purposes. Section 701(b) would be amended to include a finding that the need for parks and other open space in built-up portions of urban areas is especially great in low income neighborhoods and communities.

Section 702(a) of the amended title would authorize the Secretary to make grants to States and local public bodies to help finance (1) the acquisition of title to, or other interest in, open space land in urban areas and (2) the development of open space or other land in urban areas for open space uses. Such grants could not exceed 50 percent of the eligible project cost, as approved by the Secretary, of such acquisition or development. In effect, the section would provide statutory authority for the Secretary to provide all assistance currently authorized in section 702 (grants for preservation and development of open space land), section 705 (provision of open space land in urban areas), section 706 (urban beautification and improvement), and section 709 (historic preservation) of the Housing Act of 1961. The existing statutory authorities would be amended to make clear that grants may be made to (1) help acquire less than fee interests in open space land (2) help develop, for open space uses, lands which were not originally acquired with assistance under section 702. A new provision would be added which would authorize, where regulations of the Secretary permit, 50 percent of the non-Federal share of eligible project costs to be made up by donations of land or materials.

Section 702(b) of the amended title would provide that no grants under the title may be used to (1) defray ordinary State or local governmental expenses (2) help finance the acquisition by a public body of land outside the urban areas for which it exercises (or participates in the exercise of) responsibilities consistent with the purposes of the title, (3) acquire and clear developed land in built-up urban areas unless the local governing body determines that adequate open space land cannot be effectively provided through the use of existing undeveloped land, or (4) provide assistance for historic and architectural preservation, except for projects which the Secretary finds meets criteria comparable to those used in establishing the National Register maintained by the Secretary of Interior. In effect, this section incorporates the statutory requirements now found in section 702(c) and 705 of the Housing Act of 1961 and section 605(h) of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966.

Section 702(c) of the amended title would restate existing section 702(d) which permits the Secretary to set such further terms and conditions for grants as he determines to be desirable.

Section 702(d) of the amended title would restate existing section 702(e) which requires the Secretary to consult with, and exchange information with, the Secretary of the Interior with respect to his activities under this title.

Section 702(e) of the amended title would authorize the Secretary to provide advice and technical assistance to States and local public bodies.

Section 703 of the amended title would authorize grants under the title only if the Secretary finds that such assistance is needed for carrying out a unified or officially coordinated program, meeting criteria established by him, for the provision and development of open space land. Such program must be either a part of, or consistent with, the comprehensively planned development of the urban area.

Section 704 of the amended title would prohibit the conversion to other uses of open space land acquired with assistance under the title without prior approval of the Secretary. Such prior approval to be granted only upon satisfactory compliance with regulations established by the Secretary which shall require findings that (1) there is adequate assurance of the substitution of other open space land of as nearly as feasible equivalent usefulness, location, and fair market value; (2) the conversion and substitution are needed for orderly growth and development; and (3) the proposed uses of the converted and substituted land are in accord with the then applicable comprehensive plan for the urban area, meeting criteria established by the Secretary. The section is based upon, and is substantially similar to, section 704 of the Housing Act of 1961.

Section 705 of the amended title would authorize to be appropriated for purposes of making grants under the title not to exceed $460,000,000 prior to July 1, 1971 and such sums as may be necessary thereafter. Any amounts appropriated shall remain available until expended.

(1) "open space land" to mean any land located in an urban area which has value for (A) park and recreational purposes, (B) conservation of land and other natural resources, or (C) historic, architectural, or scenic purposes.

(2) "urban area" to mean any area which is urban in character, including those surrounding areas which, in the judgment of the Secretary form an economic and socially related region, taking into consideration such factors as present and future population trends and patterns of urban growth, location of transportation facilities and systems, and distribution of industrial, commercial, residential, governmental, institutional, and other activities.

(3) "State" to mean any of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Territories and possessions of the United States, and Indian tribes, bands, groups and nations, including Alaska Indians, Aleuts, and Eskimos of the United States.

(4) "open-space uses" to mean any use of open-space land for (A) park and recreational purposes, (B) conservation of land and other natural resources, or (C) historic, architectural or scenic purposes.

Section 402—Authorization for comprehensive planning

This section would amend section 701(b) of the Housing Act of 1954 to increase the total amount authorized to be appropriated for comprehensive planning assistance after June 30, 1971, by such sums as may be necessary.

Section 403—Authorization for water and sewer facilities and neighborhood facilities.

This section would amend section 708(b) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1965 to increase the total amount authorized to be appropriated for grants after June 30, 1971 for basic water and sewer facilities and for neighborhood facilities by such sums as may be necessary. The existing authorization for appropriations for the advance acquisition of land program would be deleted.

Section 404—Authorization for training and fellowship program

This section would amend section 806 of the Housing Act of 1964 to authorize to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary for Fellowships for City Planning and Urban Studies and the Community Development Training Program.

Section 405—New communities program

Subsection (a) of this section would amend section 407(a) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 to authorize the Secretary to issue obligations to the Secretary of the Treasury in an amount outstanding at any one time sufficient to enable the Secretary to carry out his functions with respect to guarantees covering the obligations of new community developers. Any obligations issued by the Secretary would have maturities and bear interest at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Subsection (b) of this section would amend section 407(d) of such Act to increase the aggregate of the outstanding principal obligations of new community developers which may be guaranteed at any one time from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000.

Subsection (c) of this section would amend section 412(d) of such Act to provide that any amounts authorized for any fiscal year for new community assistance grants but not appropriated may be appropriated for any succeeding fiscal year.

Subsection (c) of this section would add a new section 416 to such Act authorizing the Secretary to provide technical and advisory services to new community developers and to States, municipalities, and other political subdivisions and instrumentalities.

TITLE V—RESEARCH AND TECHNOLOGY

Section 501—Technical research and demonstrations

This section would authorize and direct the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to undertake such programs of research, studies, testing, and demonstration relating to the mission and programs of the Department as he determines to be necessary and appropriate. To carry out activities under this section there would be authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary. All funds so appropriated would remain available until expended unless specifically limited.

Section 502—General provisions

This section brings together under one heading a series of administrative and other provisions which are applicable to activities under section 501.

Subsection (a) of this section, which is based on section 1010 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966, and section 417 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1969, directs the Secretary, to the extent feasible, to require the use of advanced technology under programs administered by him, and to encourage and promote the acceptance and application of such advanced technology by all segments of the housing industry, communities, and the general public. In carrying out his activities under section 501, the Secretary shall assure, to the extent feasible, in connection with the construction, major rehabilitation, or maintenance of any housing assisted under that section, that there is no restraint by contract, building code, zoning ordinance, or practice against the employment of new or improved technologies, techniques, materials, and methods or of preassembled products which may reduce the cost or improve the quality of such construction, rehabilitation, and maintenance, and therefore stimulate expanded production of housing under this title, except where such restraint is necessary to insure safe and healthful working and living conditions. The subsection also contains a new authorization to the Secretary to waive, with respect to his activities under section 501, those provisions of the United States Housing Act of 1937 and other acts administered by him which impede the acceptance and application of new or improved technology.

Subsection (b) of this section is based on section 108 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968. It provides that in order to encourage large-scale experimentation in the use of new technology with a view toward the ultimate mass production of housing and related facilities, the Secretary shall, wherever feasible conduct programs under section 501 in which qualified organizations, public and private, will submit plans for development and production of housing and related facilities using such new advances on Federal land or other land where local building regulations or variances from them permit such experimental construction. The Secretary may utilize the funds and authority available under section 501 to assist in the implementation of plans which he approves.

Subsection (c) of this section is based on provisions in section 1010 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966 and section 108 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968. The Secretary would be authorized, in connection with projects under this title, to acquire and dispose of land and other property required for the project as he deems necessary. It further provides that any land which is excess property within the meaning of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, may be transferred to the Secretary upon his request if the Secretary determines that the land is suitable for use in furtherance of the purposes of section 502(b).

Subsection (d) of this section which is based on section 314 of the Housing Act of 1954, section 301 of the Housing Act of 1948, section 602 of the Housing Act of 1956, and section 1011 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966, authorizes the Secretary to pay for the cost of writing and publishing reports on activities financed under section 501, and similar activities, not so financed, which are of significant value in furthering the purposes of that section. Information acquired could be disseminated in the form most useful to agencies of Federal, State and local governments, industry, and the public. The Secretary would also be authorized to provide advice and technical assistance as may be required in carrying out his activities under section 501.

Subsection (e) of this section is based on provisions in section 301 of the Housing Act of 1948, section 314 of the Housing Act of 1954, section 207 of the Housing Act of 1961, and sections 1010 and 1011 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966. It authorizes the Secretary to carry out his functions under section 501 either directly, or by contract or grant. The making of advance and progress payments would be authorized and contracts made without advertising. Contracts or grants may be made for work to continue for not more than 4 years from the date thereof.

Subsection (f) of this section is based on title III of the Housing Act of 1948, section 602 of the Housing Act of 1956 and section 601 of the Economy Act of 1932 (31 U.S.C. 686). It requires the Secretary to utilize facilities of other Federal departments and agencies, to consult with and make recommendations to such agencies, and authorizes him to enter into working agreements with them; including the making of contracts or grants on behalf of such agencies or having such contracts or grants made on his behalf. The Secretary would also be authorized to work with, and enter into contracts with, State and local governments, industry and labor, educational and other organizations.

Subsection (g) of this section is based on provisions in section 602 of the Housing Act of 1956 and provides that the Secretary is authorized to obtain information from private and public sources. Such information may be used only for the purposes for which it is supplied, and no publication may be made whereby the information furnished by a particular source can be identified except with the consent of such source.

Section 503—Repeal of existing research authorities

This section would repeal, effective July 1, 1971, except for contracts commitments, reservations, or other obligations entered into prior to that date, title III of the Housing Act of 1948, section 314 of the Housing Act of 1954, section 602 of the Housing Act of 1956, section 207 of the Housing Act of 1961, section 301 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1965, sections 1010 and 1011 of the Demonstration Cities and Metropolitan Development Act of 1966, and section 108 and subsection 1714(b) of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968.

TITLE VI—MISCELLANEOUS

Section 601—Advice and assistance with respect to housing for lower income families

This section would amend section 106 of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 to authorize cooperative as well as nonprofit sponsors to receive advice, assistance, and "seed money" loans with respect to the provision of housing for lower income families. It would also consolidate and expand existing advice and assistance programs for lower income families—section 235(e) and 237(e) (homeownership assistance) and section 15 (10) of the U.S. Housing Act (tenant services grants) and provide statutory authorization for these programs under section 106. The program of tenant services grants now authorized under section 15(10) of the U.S. Housing Act of 1937 would be extended to low-income housing tenant organizations assisted under that Act and to nonprofit cooperative and limited dividend housing organizations or lower income tenant organizations in projects assisted under the National Housing Act or the Mortgage Credit Assistance Act.

Section 602—General administrative powers of the secretary

This section would include among the administrative powers of the Secretary set forth in section 7 of the Department of Housing and Urban Development Act general authority to (1) keep in a consolidated checking account in the Treasury all funds made available from appropriations, recoveries, fees or otherwise in connection with any loan or grant program—such funds to be available for administrative expenses if authorized by the Congress, (2) foreclose on, acquire, manage, and sell property in connection with loan and grant programs, (3) establish fees and charges to cover such nonadministrative expenses as costs of inspection, project review, financing service, project audit, etc.—such fees and charges to be available for operating expenses of the Department in providing similar services on a consolidated basis, (4) receive uncompensated services and bequests and gifts, and (5) establish advisory commissions.

Numbers 1 and 2 above (except for the deletion of provisions requiring a Government Corporation business-type budget) are similar to existing authorities in section 402 of the Housing Act of 1950 and are incorporated by reference in many of the Department's loan and grant statutes.

Section 603—Equity skimming

This section would make it a crime to engage in the practice of purchasing one- to four-family dwellings subject to FHA-insured or VA loans and applying the rent receipts to one's own use instead of making payments on such loans. For the protection of those purchasing in good faith, the criminal penalties provided by this section would only apply if the loan was in default at time of purchase or within one year subsequent to the purchase and would not apply to the purchaser of only one such dwelling. The section is intended to deter the so-called practice of "equity skimming," which has resulted in losses to the FHA and VA in the past.

Section 604—Additional authorization for college housing debt service grants

This section would amend section 401 (f)(2) of the Housing Act of 1950 to increase the aggregate amount of contracts which may be entered into after June 30, 1971 to make annual debt service grants to help finance college housing facilities by such sums as may be necessary.

Section 605—National Banking Act

This section would authorize National banks to underwrite and deal in obligations guaranteed under the New Communities Act of 1968.

Section 606—Increased fees for consultant services

This section would amend section 7(e) of the Department of Housing and Urban Development Act to increase the maximum amount payable to consultants from the present $100 per diem to the daily equivalent to the highest rate for grade GS–18.

Section 607—Effective date

This section would provide that titles I, II and III of this Act shall be effective not later than 180 days following the date of enactment except as the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development shall prescribe an earlier date with respect to all or any part of such titles.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to:

Mr. KYROS (at the request of Mr. COHELAN), for today and the remainder of the week, on account of official business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. FRIEDEL, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 11959. An act to amend chapters 31, 34, and 35 of title 38, United States Code, in order to increase the rates of vocational rehabilitation, education assistance, and special training allowance paid to eligible veterans and persons under such chapters; to amend chapters 34, 35, and 36 of such title to make certain improvements in the educational programs for eligible veterans and dependents; and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p.m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, March 25, 1970, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1824. A letter from the Assistant to the Commissioner, District of Columbia, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation relating to the rental of space for the accommodation of District of Columbia agencies and activities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

1825. A letter from the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, transmitting the 19th annual report of the Commissioner of Education relative to school assistance in federally affected areas, pursuant to the provisions of subsection 301(c), Public Law 874, and subsection 12(c), Public Law 815, 81st Congress; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

1826. A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Foreign Service Act of 1946, as amended, to lower the mandatory retirement age for Foreign Service officers who are career ministers; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1827. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the need for the Department of Housing and Urban Development to strengthen concrete inspections and testing requirements in the construction of low-rent public housing projects; to the Committee on Government Operations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause of 2 rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS: Committee of Conference. Conference report on H.R. 514 (Rept. No. 91-937). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. PRICE of Illinois: Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. House Resolution 796. Resolution amending the Rules of the House of Representatives relating to financial disclosure. (Rept. No. 91-938). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FALLON: Committee of conference. Conference report on H.R. 4148 (Rept. No. 91-940). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. SISK: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 891. Resolution for consideration of H.R. 14385, a bill to provide authority for subsidized transportation for Public Health Service employees affected by the transfer to the Parklawn Building in Rockville, Md. (Rept. No. 91-941). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. ANDERSON of Tennessee: Committee on Rules: House Resolution 892. Resolution for consideration of H.R. 15733, a bill to amend the Railroad Retirement Act of 1937 to provide a 15-percent increase in annuities and to change the method of computing interest on investments of the railroad retirement accounts. (Rept. No. 91-942). Referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PEPPER: Committee on Rules. House Resolution 893. Resolution for consideration of H.R. 16516, a bill to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, construction of facilities, and research and program management, and for other purposes. (Rept. No. 91-943). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows.

Mr. GARMATZ: Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. S. 1177. An act to authorize the documentation of the vessel West Wind as a vessel of the United States with coastwise privileges. (Rept. No. 91-939). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BEVILL (for himself, Mr. ANDREWS of Alabama, Mr. BUCHANAN, Mr. EDWARDS of Alabama, Mr. NICHOLS, and Mr. FLOWERS):

H.R. 16620. A bill to amend section 32(e) of title III of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish financial assistance in carrying out plans for works of improvement for land conservation and utilization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. QUIE (for himself, Mr. AYRES, Mr. GERALD R. FORD, Mr. ERLENBORN, Mr. ESHLEMAN, Mr. COLLINS, Mr. HANSEN of Idaho, and Mr. ESCH):

H.R. 16621. A bill to extend and amend the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. QUIE:

H.R. 16622. A bill to promote higher education throughout the Nation by providing general assistance to colleges and universities; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

341. Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Hawaii, relative to repealing title II of the Internal Security Act of 1950; to the Committee on Internal Security.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PROGRESS IN APPALACHIA: A MODEL FOR FEDERAL-STATE COOPERATION

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a Democratic Congress enacted the Appalachian Regional Development Act upon the recommendation of President Johnson in 1965. The U.S. News & World Report in its current issue points out that this program may become a model for Federal-State cooperation and assistance for development of rural areas in Appalachia.

One of the major thrusts of this program is highway construction to provide access to areas in need of industry and employment. In this connection, a total of 267 miles of highway have now been completed in the 13-State area.

In addition, under this program 238 vocational and technical schools have been built or are under construction. Other public facilities under construction or completed under the Appalachian program include 193 health centers and hospitals, 43 airports, 72 libraries, and 120 facilities for colleges and universities, among others.

The program is moving rapidly ahead now and in this connection, I want to commend the present Federal cochairman, Mr. John L. Waters of Tennessee, who is doing an outstanding work in carrying out the objectives and goals of Appalachian redevelopment as envisioned by Congress.

The Subcommittee on Independent Offices Appropriations, which I am honored to serve as chairman, has this year conducted hearings on the Appalachian Commission's request for $295,000,000 in appropriations for next fiscal year to fund its programs—including $175 million for the highway program.

Because of the interest of the American people and my colleagues in this most important subject, I place the article from U.S. News & World Report in the RECORD herewith:

The article follows:

PROGRESS IN APPALACHIA: A MODEL FOR FEDERAL AID?

(Five years ago, Congress began a big experiment to lift up depressed Appalachia. After a slow start, the plan shows signs of success. Many officials believe it has answers to some problems of other, more prosperous, areas. This report gives the results of the first regional attack on poverty.)

The Nixon Administration, in its search for a new policy to guide the growth of America, is looking at an area that a decade ago was regarded as a symbol of backwardness—Appalachia.

Officials believe the regional development program that began there in 1965 is working. In addition, the special problems of Appalachia are being tackled in a way that seems to fit the President's notion of how the Federal Government and the States should work togther.

Threefold problem.—A decade ago, an average of 220,000 persons per year were leaving Appalachia. Average income was far below the national level. Unemployment was nearly double that for the nation as a whole.

The number of people leaving the area has dropped to about one third the level of the 1950's. Is another 10 years, the movement out of Appalachia is expected to be no problem.

The character of the migration has changed, too. Once it was primarily poor people shifting to the cities of the Midwest and Northeast. Now, much of the movement is into nearby areas of the South, such as the Carolina Piedmont or Atlanta, or into urban sections of Appalachia itself.

On the basis of two important measures of prosperity—average income and the rate of unemployment—this region has actually shown more rapid improvement during the last few years than the rest of the nation. Appalachia still lags behind in both respects, but it is catching up, officials insist.

The Appalachian Regional Commission was created in 1965 with a pipeline straight into the White House through a federal cochairman named by the President. Its area of concern is all of West Virginia and parts of New York, Pennsylvania. Ohio, Maryland, Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi.

Governors of all these States are Commission members. Their goal is to speed up economic development and reduce poverty.

Most of Appalachia is mountainous. There is little good farmland. Even homesites are scarce in some rugged areas. Coal mining, still an important industry, accounts for only about 3 per cent of the jobs in the region.

In its first five years, the ARC has spent slightly more than a billion dollars of federal money. The first big program was a network of roads designed to open up isolated areas. Originally, 2,700 miles were planned. Rising costs cut this back by about one third to 1,752. So far:

248 miles of roads have been completed.

422 miles are still under construction.

1,082 miles are being engineered or have right-of-way work under way.

One early result of the roadbuilding has been to make it possible to commute from Hazard, Ky., a mountain community with an excess labor supply, to Lexington, where jobs are available. Before 1968, the trip took 3½ hours. Now, it takes 1½ hours.

In trying to provide a broader base for future growth, these projects either have been finished or are being built:

238 vocational schools.

120 higher-education facilities, mostly community colleges.

193 health units, mostly hospitals.

55 mine-rehabilitation projects.

The Commission has a regional housing program that in a year and a half has generated construction of 4,848 units. This is roughly 12 times as many federally subsidized housing units as had been built in the period 1965–68, officials say.

In Appalachia, the emphasis is on urban but not metropolitan growth—and also on making it easier for people to live in the country and work in the city.

Ninety per cent of the population increase for the nation as a whole from 1960 to 1966 came in metropolitan counties—around the largest cities. In Appalachia, about 40 per cent of the expansion in this period came in much smaller urban counties—where the population was 10,000 to 50,000.

ARC planners long ago ruled out any "back to the land" movement or effort merely to bring in new factories. For one thing, Appalachia already has a greater proportion of its employment in manufacturing than the U.S. as a whole.

For another, experts say, the big problem is a lack of urban centers large enough to provide a service base for industry already there. Most new jobs opening up today are in service industries—stores, laundries, restaurants.

Role of the cities.—Urbanization, says ARC Executive Director Ralph Widner, is the process through which services of all sorts are delivered to people. These industries help recirculate payrolls and multiply the economic benefits, he explains.

"If we refuse to recognize the essential role which urbanization must play in rural development," Mr. Widner says, "we will have local economies that 'leak' local industrial and agricultural-payroll dollars (that leave the community)—leaks that over the long pull can sink any economies."

Also, he adds: "The Commission recognized that the nation has become essentially a network of labor sheds or service areas with urban complexes at their core, and that these areas are presently the basic functional economic units in the national economy and in Appalachia and should be the basic planning units for any regional development efforts."

Thus, the goal in Appalachia is to make these labor sheds as efficient as possible, with jobs, health services, education and the like readily accessible to all who live in the area.

Appalachia is divided into 60 local planning and development districts. They are made up of several counties each, with one or more existing or planned areas of potential growth in each district. There are 22 regional centers, which are larger communities that serve several districts; 78 primary centers, where significant expansion is expected and major investments are intended, and 88 secondary centers, where only enough educational and health facilities will be provided to take care of nearby rural areas.

Community planning.—Each district works out its own plan for economic development. Usually, local officials seek to accelerate trends already under way. For example, when several sections of the interstate highway system passed close by the Scranton-Wilkes-Barre area of Pennsylvania, a new function developed for these communities as a distribution center for the region around New York City, 100 miles away. ARC then was called on to help build industrial parks and other facilities needed to expand this new role.

In eastern Kentucky, an urban service area is evolving around three small towns—Pikeville, Prestonsburg and Paintsville—to serve a surrounding population of 300,000 persons. Most of the growth centers in Appalachia are planned in this fashion around existing towns or clusters of towns.

However, in some districts there is no community large enough for a growth nucleus, though there still is a relatively thick rural population. Here new towns are being created.

Examples of these new communities are Midland, Ky., on Interstate 64 near Morehead; Lucasville, Ohio, a new town near Portsmouth; and Fairdale, a new town site near Beckley, W. Va.

Allocation of funds.—Not only is the planning a bit different in Appalachia, but the way the money is spent is different, too.

Congress appropriates money to the ARC for broad uses—highways, education, health and so on.

The Commission can shift some of this money from one purpose to another, if requirements should change. The States, too, have some leeway to switch funds to fit the needs of their over-all plans.

Local and State planners work closely together in deciding on community projects. They determine what portion the community can pay, how much is needed from the ARC and where to go for other funds.

Small towns often have fared badly in seeking federal aid because a good deal of know-how is necessary to keep track of the many programs and their complex requirements. Through use of multicounty districts working with State experts, a poor community in Appalachia can gain some of the resources of a larger, more prosperous city in bidding for additional federal funds.

Five other regional commissions have been established under the Economic Development Act and operate under the Department of Commerce.

The ARC is the oldest regional commission and the only one not operating under the Department.

"Partnership."—How do the Governors like the program? Says Governor Arch A. Moore of West Virginia:

"Never before has there been a federal-State partnership quite like the one in this Act, and it works.

"Every single one of the Governors of the Appalachian States—and we cover the whole range of the political spectrum—likes this program."

Administration planners see this as a possible working model of Mr. Nixon's "new federalism." State and local officials plan and make decisions together, with emphasis on building up moderate-size cities around existing small towns, plus some new towns to take pressures off metropolitan areas, and private economic growth is heavily stressed instead of continued federal aid.

CRIME'S HUNGRY FLAMES NEED FIRM DAMPING

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, an editorial in the Friday, March 20, New World, the official publication of the Catholic archdiocese of Chicago, emphasized the need for effective legislation so that we might combat the crimewave sweeping the country. The editorial, I believe, contains a very effective and timely commentary on the growing crime which has afflicted our Nation.

The article follows:

CRIME'S HUNGRY FLAMES NEED FIRM DAMPING

Over the last nine years, the population of the United States has increased 13%. But crimes of violence in this country increased almost 10 times as fast as the population: murders, up 66%; forcible rapes, up 115%; robberies, up 180%; aggravated assaults, up 103%. So reports U.S. News & World Report in a special report on crime in its Mar. 16 issue, "Why Streets Are Not Safe."

And why aren't the streets safe in many U.S. cities, particularly in the larger American cities—and especially in the nation's capital? Senator Mike Mansfield of Montana has said of Washington:

"It is a capital blanketed in fear. Fear stalks the streets. It seeps into office and home. It afflicts rich and poor . . . It spreads and will continue to spread into what were supposed to be the 'safe' suburbs . . . People flee the streets at dark and, more and more, even in daylight."

The situation in Washington is such that the daily papers have a special column for "crime reports," with robberies, rapes and assaults on the previous day listed in small type. Washington buses were probably the first to insist on "exact fare"; and already this has been carried a step further. Washington gas stations now ask that you have the exact change for the gas pumped into your car. The reason? To avoid having money on hand which may be tempting to thieves.

What are the reasons for this ever increasing crime wave?

Experts cite several causes, narcotics for one. It is recognized that the addict needs a steady flow of money to satisfy his craving for drugs. Police Chief Jerry Wilson of Washington told a congressional committee that the narcotics problem is adding greatly to the crime problem. "If we could cure our narcotics problems we could do a great deal toward curing our over-all crime problem," he said.

Poverty, ghettoes, inner city despair are also blamed, along with what many call a failure of the criminal-justice system. A report to Congress on armed violence said that "the way the criminal justice system operates at present is an abomination of justice and, undoubtedly, a significant contributor to armed crimes. The juvenile court proceeds so slowly in adjudicating its cases that juveniles often feel that it is 'safe' to commit a crime . . ."

Other possible causes are listed as understaffed police forces, and there seems much merit in this. In Washington, for instance, when police forces were increased through overtime, crime on the streets dropped significantly. When the overtime was cut back, and in effect the number of police on the street reduced, the crime rate shot upward.

Permissiveness in the family and in society is also blamed for the rising crime rate. One attorney general said people, generally, are not committing crimes because they're hungry. "The motivation," he said, "seems to be that society has such a permissive attitude that even if the criminal gets caught, some lawyer will get him off or the judge will tap his wrists with probation."

One instance was a Washington case where two young men robbed a bank and were caught by police a short distance from the bank. Both youths were armed, there was no question of their guilt, and they received suspended sentences.

There is no easy answer to crime in the streets. But it is a growing problem that demands a solution.

A MEMBER OF THE MILITARY-INDUSTRIAL COMPLEX VIEWS HIS ESTABLISHMENT

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, at a time when the Defense Establishment is becoming the scapegoat for all the problems afflicting this society, I think it is useful, and even refreshing, to hear from a bona fide member of that "establishment."

Philip N. Whittaker, Assistant Secretary of the Air Force for Installations and Logistics, is a former employee of International Business Machines—IBM, and only recently—1968—a recruit onto the rolls of public servants.

Men of his caliber are desperately needed in such a capacity.

Mr. Whittaker spoke at Dickinson College in Carlisle, Pa., last year on the operation of the defense industries and the progress of President Nixon's Vietnamization program.

His remarks are worth noting, both on their merits and because they offer an opportunity to catch a personalized glimpse of that vast operation characterized by the late President Dwight D. Eisenhower in his farewell address as the "military-industrial complex."

His speech follows:

REMARKS BY HON. PHILIP N. WHITTAKER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE AIR FORCE, INSTALLATIONS AND LOGISTICS, DICKINSON COLLEGE, CARLISLE, PA., OCTOBER 15, 1969

Last week, my daughter Letsy called home —collect as usual—and invited me to come on up here as a representative, I guess, of both the older generation and of the Military/Industrial Complex—two phenomena, I realize, separated from many in this audience by a distance equal to several light years.

Facing you this morning, I feel a little bit like the fellow who was tarred and feathered and ridden out of town on a rail. He was heard to remark, "If it weren't for the honor of the thing, I would just as soon walk." Nevertheless, I am grateful for this opportunity. I will try not to lecture you but I do want to simply express my feelings on some issues which I believe are important to all of us.

To set the framework for my remarks, let me agree with Hamlet that "the time is out of joint" indeed. Many aspects of modern life—the problems of urban blight, rural poverty, environmental pollution, educational excellence across-the-board, the transportation crisis, to name just a few—represent needs crying out for imaginative and costly solutions. Then there is, of course, the disenchantment in some areas with the military and the industry which sells to it and the widespread frustration over the conflict in Southeast Asia. It is about these latter subjects that I want to talk today.

On the subject of the military and the Military/Industrial Complex, let me simply say that I believe that this country requires the maintenance of a strong military capability. I make this statement in full recognition of the competing demands on the federal budget for a large number of high priority civilian requirements. Contrary to some impressions that have been created, the military budget is not growing at any unprecedented and alarming rate and is not swallowing up ever larger proportions of the federal treasury. On the contrary, the military budget, as a percent of the Gross National Product, has decreased from over 13% in 1953 to an estimated 8.1% this current fiscal year.

This year, the budget for the Department of Defense has received very severe scrutiny in the Congress, and all kinds of probing questions have been asked. This is as it should be, and our elected representatives in the Congress should do and, I believe, in many cases are doing, a thorough and conscientious job of balancing priorities among all of the competing pleas for the taxpayer's dollar.

There is a large segment of industry which furnishes the equipment required by the military. In every large-scale undertaking of this type, a few instances come to the surface of profiteering on the part of businessmen or inefficiency on the part of government employees. In general, however, considering the two million contracts let just by the Department of the Air Force in a given year, even if 99-and-44/100% of them were handled entirely properly, that would still leave 10,000 or more incorrect or faulty actions and those are the ones which the newspapers delight in playing up. Independent studies have shown that companies generally make considerably lower rates of profit on defense business than on commercial business. There is also a government agency called the Renegotiation Board which reviews the total profits on all major government contractors at the end of each year and which takes back any profits that it considers excessive. So the image of profiteering on the part of defense industry is largely misleading.

It has been suggested that those companies doing a large share of their business with the Department of Defense should be taken over by the government, but I can assure you that if all defense supplies were to be manufactured in government-owned laboratories and factories, it would be far more difficult to attain the efficiency which exists under the present system of acquiring defense materiel from private industry—entirely aside from the fact that such a move would be in direct violation of the American system of free enterprise.

Now just a few comments on the toughest problem of all—Southeast Asia. Every one of us is united in devoutly wishing that U.S. involvement there was terminated. I wish it were as simple as just packing up and walking out. But it isn't. I don't know whether it was right or wrong, wise or foolish to have initially become involved militarily in Southeast Asia—but this I do know—there are thousands of people in South Vietnam who have come to count on the U.S. shield, and I am not just talking about the top government leaders. There are also millions of people around the world who are waiting to see whether this country, as we did after World War I, will retreat into a posture of isolationism and not be concerned over the rest of the world.

The problem is both simple and enormously complex. As the President has repeatedly said—the U.S. is negotiating in good faith and as hard as it can with the North Vietnamese and the Viet Cong in Paris. At the same time, it is attempting to contain the military situation in South Vietnam and, finally, as the third leg of a three-part program, is engaged in a very active program of training and equipping the South Vietnamese as well as increasing the stability of the countryside of South Vietnam.

This Vietnamization is something new. Not only will it enable the South Vietnamese Armed Forces to assume greater military responsibility and, in fact, eventually take over both the Viet Cong insurgency and the defense against the regular North Vietnamese Armed Forces, but it also means building a stronger economy and a stronger government in South Vietnam.

Here is a progress report on the achievements and promise of the Vietnamization program in four areas: stronger economy, stronger police for internal security, stronger government, and stronger military forces. Let me touch on these areas and quote a recent report from the Secretary of Defense.

In the economic field, a significant factor is the opening up of waterways and roads for farmers to bring their produce to market and the growing confidence of farmers in using them. In addition, South Vietnamese have replaced Americans in the operation of the civilian port facilities at Saigon and at supply and warehousing facilities in various parts of the country. They are moving toward restoration of self-sufficiency in rice production. Of course, progress in an economy distorted by war is bound to be uneven. Vietnam suffers from the chronic wartime malady of steep inflation, but the government of Vietnam is attempting to face up to this problem with American help.

In the field of local security, the police force has been expanded and its training strengthened. Partly for this reason, the Viet Cong infrastructure is being weakened and rooted out in many areas.

In the political field, progress is measured by the extent of the peoples' trust in their government. It is at the grass—or "rice"—roots level where we find encouraging signs. Locally elected governments are spreading throughout the country. Self-government has been brought this year to more than 700 villages and hamlets in recently pacified areas, bringing the total with self-government to about 8 out of every 10. There has been a notable increase in the number of citizens willing to seek local office and hence to face the threat of Viet Cong terrorism which has taken such a toll of local officials in past years.

Time is the critical factor and Hanoi is looking at all of us here in the United States to see whether the American public has the will and the patience to stick it out. My belief is that the program of Vietnamization and the transfer of responsibility, coupled with stability, to the people of South Vietnam offers by far the best chance for the successful conclusion of this tragic conflict.

I mentioned the problem of time as a critical factor. Making this problem harder to bear is the fact that we are living in an era of impatience. Everyone—and I think young people in particular—is more and more demanding today, or at least they are being conditioned to expect immediacy. Tomorrow is not soon enough. We have instant communications, instant gratification of our desires, hence the dissatisfaction with the absence of instant solutions to the problems we face.

Several closing thoughts. I have been working for the government for only the past year. Without blowing my own horn, I wish to simply say I came into the government at a considerable sacrifice in salary because I was asked to help run the Air Force as efficiently and as economically as possible. I want to say as emphatically as possible that I have been constantly impressed by the dedication and competence of the great majority of people that it has been my pleasure to meet who are working in the government. I am speaking of both civilian and military personnel. I think it would be a tragedy if a polarization between the military/government and private elements of our society develops.

Let me close by quoting a statement made some years ago by General Twining, the former Chief of Staff of the Air Force. His words reflect the feeling of the vast majority of defense personnel. He said, "The Air Force will have served its finest purpose if it is never used in combat."

I congratulate you on this kind of a meeting. I invite you to think deeply and constructively about the problems this nation faces. I hope you will do your own thinking and not be used by others, that you will develop positive rather than simply negative proposals and programs, and that you will have the wisdom and maturity to recognize that the issues are complex and not all of the answers easy.

REFORM OF THE FEDERAL ROLE IN HIGHER EDUCATION

HON. CLARENCE J. BROWN

OF OHIO

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, as most of you realize, much of the basic legislation pertaining to higher education expires during the next 15 months. Now, however, President Nixon has proposed a reform of the Federal role in higher education through his recent message to the Congress. In this document, you will find that the President has proposed positive action to answer most of the major criticisms aimed at higher education today.

Many of us daily receive letters from anxious parents who wonder why the Federal Government cannot do something about increasing support for college students. Under the President's proposal, no student would be denied attendance at a college or university simply because he did not have the money. Basic reforms are offered which would increase grants and subsidized loans to children from low-income families; and which would insure a greater number of guaranteed loans to those whose families are more capable of bearing this expense.

For those who do not want or need a 4-year education, the President has proposed a career education program to assist the States in teaching critically needed skills at community colleges and technical institutes.

And finally, the President has proposed to establish a National Foundation for Higher Education to support excellence, innovation, and reform in private and public institutions.

I applaud the President's initiative in this field and hope that my colleagues will give his proposals enthusiastic support.

OBSERVATIONS ON CHICAGO 7 TRIAL

HON. ABNER J. MIKVA

OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, it has long been my feeling that as a member of the Illinois bar and a member of the Judiciary Committee of this House, it would be inappropriate for me to comment on the events which have recently occurred in Chicago, centering around the so-called Chicago 7 conspiracy trial. Nevertheless, none of us can ignore that that trial on Federal conspiracy and crossing-State-lines-to-incite-a-riot charge has raised a tremendous public furor, both in Chicago and throughout the Nation. I believe that the citizens of our country will probably benefit from full and free discussion of this controversial issue, even if it is inappropriate for me to comment on it while the matter is still before the courts.

Mr. George Anastaplo, professor at Rosary College and lecturer at the University of Chicago, has written an article which expresses his views on the significance of the recent events in Chicago. The article was published, in a slightly modified form, in the Chicago Sun-Times on February 22, 1970, and has been widely read in Chicago. I believe that it might be useful to have Mr. Anastaplo's observations available to my colleagues. I insert them at this point in the RECORD.

The article referred to follows:

THE TRIAL: DISGRACEFUL MASQUERADE

(NOTE.—Prof. George Anastaplo, for the five months the so-called Chicago 7 conspiracy trial was being heard, attended two to three daily sessions a week. Now Prof. Anastaplo, the chairman of the department of political science at Rosary College, has written an article about that trial for the Sun-Times. In addition to his position at Rosary College, he is a lecturer in the liberal arts at the University of Chicago. He has a law degree and a PhD degree from the University of Chicago and has written several articles on legal and constitutional subjects as well as a book, "The Constitutionalist: Notes on the First Amendment," due to be published by the Southern Methodist University Press. [Editor])

(By George Anastaplo)

Five defendants have been found guilty by a Chicago jury of crossing state lines with the intention of inciting a riot during Convention week of August 1968. Eight defendants and their two lawyers in this federal trial have been pronounced guilty by a judge of courtroom behavior intended to disrupt the orderly administration of justice.

The verdict of the Conspiracy jury was surprisingly discriminating. It not only completely exonerated two of the defendants, it also repudiated, with respect to all the defendants, the conspiracy charges of which so much had been made by the government.

A conviction or acquittal on all counts of the indictment could have been explained away as merely the result of passion. But this particular verdict happens to ratify the impression of many courtroom observers of the trial, that there was no deliberate conspiracy among these defendants, that the most that could be charged to some of them was the making of irresponsible speeches on certain occasions during Convention week.

Thus, the offenses for which this jury convicted five defendants—crossing state lines with the intent of inciting a riot—were not the offenses for which these defendants were really brought to trial as a group by the U.S. attorney. The offenses for which the defendants were convicted were of the kind that are most efficiently disposed of in police court, after a trial of a few hours or (at most) a few days.

The jury verdict, properly understood, shows up the federal government's case to have been an irresponsible attempt to vindicate in the federal courts the "police riot" with which our city government (exploiting our much-abused police) made such a mess of the crisis confronting it during convention week. This willingness by the federal government to allow its courts to be used for such a political purpose has cost us dearly: It has undermined the trust of a significant part of our community, especially among the young, in the integrity of our judicial institutions; it has sustained unhealthy passions in other parts of our community against serious dissent.

It is now clear, not only from the verdict of the jury but even more from the evidence presented in this case by the government, that defendants John Froines, Bobby Seale and Lee Weiner should never have been included in the indictment on any count. It is also clear that a conscientious prosecutor should have moved to discharge at least these three defendants once his evidence and his conspiracy theory had been disclosed to be as flimsy as they were.

Without a conspiracy theory, there would have been no justification for bringing the eight defendants into the court together. Without a conspiracy theory, there would have been a much shorter and far less expensive trial. Without a conspiracy theory, there would have been no circus atmosphere, no serious or sustained disruptive events, no spectacle of a defendant being bound and gagged for stubbornly (even if improperly) insisting on counsel of his choice.

In short, there would not have been these disgraceful proceedings masquerading as a trial in a federal court.

The insistence of the government upon adhering to its disastrous conspiracy theory, without any substantial evidence to back it up, was not in the best tradition of responsible prosecution. It was simply asking for trouble—and it got it, something for which we the American people may have to pay for a long time to come.

It is now up to the appellate courts to review a rather questionable (and certainly mischievous) statute for its constitutionality and to assess whatever relevant evidence there is for its adequacy, especially since so many of the judge's rulings and attitudes left doubts about whether the defendants were permitted to make the case which they were entitled to make.

One must wonder, furthermore, whether the discredited conspiracy approach, having opened the door as it did to considerable dubious evidence from the government, so confused matters as to make it virtually impossible for the jury to see what each defendant had done, which is (the way things turned out) what the jury should have considered.

It is now up to the informed public to decide what should be done hereafter about such prosecutions and indeed about such laws as that under which this misconceived prosecution was brought.

One side effect of the prosecution is to confirm what has already been shown by several careful studies of convention week (including the government account, the Walker Report), that whatever mistakes were made by people such as the defendants, they were relatively insignificant compared to those made by the City of Chicago (against the advice, it should be noted, of the Department of Justice) in handling the demonstrations that any mature city inviting a national political convention should be prepared to expect.

As for the conduct in court of the defendants and their lawyers for which the judge has decreed prison sentences ranging from two months to four years, it is clear that some behavior in contempt of court was indulged in by both defendants and lawyers. But it is also clear that a number of actions cited by this intelligent judge simply cannot survive examination, especially those which developed either with the acquiescence of the judge or from overzealous legal advocacy.

It is up to the appellate courts to review the contempt citations, to consider whether they were entered in good time, whether the punishment was excessive, whether many of the instances cited were indeed contemptuous and whether they did disrupt the orderly administration of justice.

The fundamental problem, however, is not that of reassessing the judge's inventory of contemptuous actions—many should be dropped from his list and a few others should never have been added to it—but rather that of assessing the context in which all this unfortunate conduct took place.

There is considerable concern in this country about the threat to our judicial system of disruptive conduct in the courtroom. But we must consider what kind of defendants occasionally threaten such conduct, and in what circumstances. Such conduct (which is rare) is most likely to occur wherever defendants (because of their poverty or their status or their color) believe themselves unlikely to get "a fair shake" in court. Both the fears of widespread disruptive behavior and the measures which have been proposed for dealing with it are grossly exaggerated and are unbecoming for an American which should have learned by now how to use its great power responsibly and compassionately.

In considering the conspiracy trial, citizens must do what the bar has refused to do in public, and that is to face up to the effect in this case of the judge himself.

No fair-minded and informed community should discipline these lawyers and defendants without disciplining its judge as well. Judge Hoffman's behavior in this case was consistently outrageous, almost always against the legitimate interests of the defendants. Much of the contemptuous conduct he alleges was provoked by him.

The defendants and their Eastern lawyers were confronted by a remarkably vindictive judge. The single greatest mistake the defendants made was not to realize in time that what this judge was doing to them had been done consistently over the years by him to other defendants as well, without regard to race, color or creed.

It is common knowledge among the legal profession in Chicago, and can be confirmed by any survey of practicing lawyers, that this judge callously and systematically degrades and provokes the lawyers who happen to appear before him, unless they come from the office of the U.S. Attorney.

Indeed, this is so well known that the government can be said to have had a duty to reconsider the explosive case it was bringing when it learned which judge was fated to try it: after all, our government has the recognized obligation to see that defendants receive a fair trial and to see that our legal institutions are not recklessly undermined.

Chicago lawyers who appear regularly in the federal courts have had to learn to bear up with Judge Hoffman's behavior.

Such judicial behavior should be distinguished, by the way, from the impartial strictness for which the late Judge Barnes was justly celebrated.

Chicago lawyers have endured Judge Hoffman because they ordinarily have to bear up with him only a few days or, at worst, a few weeks at a time. In the conspiracy trial, however, defense counsel and their clients had to endure this judge for what must have seemed to them, as it did to courtroom observers, an eternity.

It is the duty of an informed bar to courageously interpose itself between a dictatorial judge and vulnerable counsel. Indeed, it was the duty of the local bar to have "blown the whistle" on Judge Hoffman many years ago, to have taken the steps necessary to restrain his unprofessional conduct.

The unbecoming failure of the bar as well as of the press to make its opinion known about this kind of judge—an opinion which is, in Judge Hoffman's case, almost unanimously bitter among those who practice in the federal courts here—lends support to critics who would have us believe that this particular judge is essentially representative of what may be found in American courthouses today.

It is the duty of all citizens, lawyers and laymen alike, to protect our country from the devastating effects of such judges. Too much depends on popular trust in our political institutions, especially among the underprivileged and the unfortunate, to permit that trust to be sacrified to the behavior of obviously unfit public servants.

TWO DANGERS CONFRONT US

One is that 10 men might be required to serve prison sentences in circumstances where the government is at least as much to blame as they are for what happened both during convention week and in the course of their trial.

The other danger is that further improper exercise of government power will provoke more resistance by offended citizens, which in turn can lead to even more repression in the name of "law and order." (Such improper exercise of government power was evident even in the way U.S. marshals were permitted to conduct themselves in the federal building throughout the Conspiracy trial: they often seemed unable to distinguish between the way prison guards do treat convicts and the way public servants should treat citizens.)

It does not seem likely, despite what the defendants claim, that a paralyzing era of repression is about to begin in this country. But we should take care not to permit an imprudent government to go out of its way to prove the defendants right about this.

We should make sure that public servants realize it is a disservice to law and order to challenge high-spirited dissent (however irresponsible and disturbing it may be on occasion) with a self-righteous show of force rather than with intelligence and generosity and imagination.

COMPLAINT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AND AIR TRANSPORTATION USERS WITH REQUEST FOR TARIFF SUSPENSION AND INVESTIGATION

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, 31 of my colleagues and I filed a petition with the Civil Aeronautics Board on March 9 asking for the suspension and investigation of any tariff extensions embodying the Board's September 12, 1969, ratemaking formula or any adjustment thereto. Our complaint, which sets forth the reasons why we believe such extensions would be illegal, follows:

COMPLAINT OF MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AND AIR TRANSPORTATION USERS WITH REQUEST FOR TARIFF SUSPENSION AND INVESTIGATION

Petitioners, thirty-two Members of Congress and users of air transportation, hereby request a suspension and investigation of any tariffs on file or hereafter filed embodying the Board's September 12, 1969, ratemaking formula, or any "adjustment" thereto, that would extend the presently effective local and joint domestic passenger fares, or those fares with minor adjustments thereto, beyond April 30, 1970, the present expiry date.

Petitioners believe such extension of the September 12 tariffs by any air carrier, whether trunkline or local service, would be illegal for the following reasons:

(1) Complainants believe that the Board's September 12 decision is illegal and any tariffs or tariff extensions based upon that decision are illegal. We have stated at length why we think this is so in our filings of April 21, August 20, September 22, 1969, and January 9 and 30, 1970, and (in the United States Court of Appeals) December 11, 1969, and January 23, and February 20, 1970; in the interest of brevity and expedition we incorporate those filings here by reference.

(2) The joint fares and division-of-fares agreement, Agreement C.A.B. 21586, and tariffs filed pursuant thereto, suffer from the same infirmities that we believe affect the Board's orders of September 12 and 30; i.e., the Board's action appears to have been reached on the basis of no evidence whatsoever taken in a proper proceeding, without considering factors set out in the statute, and thus in a manner contrary to the mandate of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 (here sections 1002 (h) and (i)).

(3) The joint fare agreement which the Board has approved appears to be unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, unduly preferential, and unduly prejudicial for the same reasons that the present arrangement suffers these illegalities. Under the present agreement, inter-carrier passengers pay the terminal charge more than once, and fall more than once in the first, highest price mileage block; the only change is there now is a $4.00 reduction in price which is plainly insufficient. At a minimum, such a passenger is required to pay $4.00 more than a one-carrier passenger for the same distance.

(4) These tariffs are unjust and unreasonable on their face. The Board's decision initially to grant and then to continue in effect the tariffs filed in accord with its prescribed maximum rate formula was not predicated upon sections 102, 404, and 1002 of the Act, but principally upon its assumption that "the carriers have adequately demonstrated a significant increase in costs, which the complainants recognize." (Order 69–9–68)

Our decision is based . . . also on the fact that the carriers' revenue need remains severe. Nothing has occurred subsequent to the granting of the October 1 increase to persuade the Board that the increases were not warranted at that time, or do not continue to be necessary to preserve the economic health of the industry. In Order 69–9–68, dated September 12, 1969, we discussed at considerable length the cost pressures faced by the carriers at that time in almost every category of costs. There is no question that the carriers have sustained substantial increases in labor expenses, landing fees, fuel costs, commission rates, and costs in other areas. Airport congestion continues to be an expensive problem, and the carriers are committed to major capital expansion programs in an effort to continue to satisfy the ever-expanding transportation requirements of the public. (Order 70–1–159, page 1 and 2)

One issue, therefore is simply whether the facts as now reported by the airlines and the Civil Aeronautics Board substantiate the Board's belief. The answer is No!

The Board has said that there is no question that the carriers have sustained substantial increases in costs for labor, materials and other services. We have noted the following in our complaint of August 20, 1969:

(T)he air carriers have jointly and severally produced on the record a substantal amount of sufficiently reliable evidentiary material as to the impact of recent inflationary increases on their cash costs to permit a change in the level of fares, all other things being equal. Had the Board previously established cash cost standards, it is clear that the Board would now be able to deal with the problem of determining an appropriate fare level more effectively. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 29, 1969, p. 27443.)

The key phrase here is "all other things being equal," for apparently, according to the records of the C.A.B., things have changed, and the air carriers have been able to more than offset the effects of inflation by means of declining unit costs. On February 26, 1970, the C.A.B. released its regular quarterly Airline Industry Economic Report for the quarter ended December 1969. In this report, the C.A.B. states that the reported cost per available ton-mile for both the domestic trunk and local service airlines declined for the year 1969, as well as for the fourth quarter (during which the fare increase was in effect).[1] There was, it is true, an increase in the reported cost per revenue ton-mile—but this is attributable to the fact passenger load factors (the ratio of sales to production) declined at a more rapid rate than costs, particularly during the last quarter when the higher fares were in effect.[2] In this regard, we must again respectfully point out to the Board that the Members of Congress clearly asserted in their petition of August 20, 1969, that the proposed tariffs would depress load factors.

The C.A.B. report does indicate that earnings did increase in the short-run, but only because the Board-made rates increased fares by a greater amount than the sale of production fell off. However, one must question the wisdom of this policy. Permitting air carriers to increase earnings by a reported $30 million a quarter (up 136%) when they sell 7.4% less of their production can hardly be considered as promoting the encouragement and development of an air transportation system properly adapted to the present and future needs of the domestic commerce, nor as fostering sound economic conditiors in such transportation, nor as promoting adequate, economical and efficient service by air carriers at reasonable charges, let alone at the lowest cost consistent with the furnishing of such service.

The need of the air carriers for increased revenue in light of "higher costs" of doing business so as to enable them, under economical and efficient management, to provide adequate and efficient air carrier service has simply not been established as a fact. In other words, neither the air carriers nor the Board has yet established on the record that the airlines are entitled to a higher level of rates or a different fare structure as a matter of fact or law. Indeed, what evidence there is—showing declining unit costs and falling load factors—suggests the opposite.

Finally, as the Board is aware, the legality of the Board's September 12 order and of any tariffs filed in conjunction with the order is presently under review in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. The case has now been submitted to that Court for decision. The Board should not compound further the illegality of its September 12 and 30 orders by approving the extensions now proposed.

Wherefore, the Members respectfully request that the Board suspend and investigate the tariffs filed by Continental Air Lines, Inc., and Eastern Air Lines, Inc., and any tariffs hereafter filed by other air carriers for extension of present fares, which such suspension and investigation would have the affect of permitting the tariffs previously on file to go into effect on May 1, 1970.

Further, the Members respectfully request that if this complaint is denied, the Board grant a stay of its order denying this complaint pending judicial review.

Respectfully submitted,

[1] See line 27, on page 7 and 11 of Appendix A. Operating Exp. per Avail. Ton-mile is a recognized measure of unit operating cost within the industry. It is considered by some as a better measure of costs than operating expense per available seat-mile because it avoids variations caused by differences in seating density. Operating expenses per available seat-mile and passenger-mile are not published in the report.

[2] It should be noted that since the Operating Exp. per Avail. Ton-mile declined only slightly, operating costs are at present directly related or responsive to capacity produced.

ECONOMIC SUMMARY—FOURTH QUARTER 1969

(Published by the Civil Aeronautics Board)

Despite significant increases in yields and revenue, profits continued to slide.—During the fourth quarter of 1969 passenger mile yields increased for the major air carrier groups, reflecting the fare changes of February and October 1969. These increases were 7.0 percent (above fourth quarter 1968) for system operations of the domestic trunk airlines and Pan American, 9.0 percent for the domestic trunk airlines in domestic operations, and 14.5 percent for the local service carriers. Operating revenues also showed significant gains during the fourth quarter with increases of 14.4 percent for system operations, 17.2 percent for the domestic operations of the trunk airlines, and 29.8 percent for the local service carriers.

However, expenses increased more than revenues while profits and rate of return continued downward. A principal reason was the disproportionate rise of capacity and consequent fall of the load factor. Passenger load factor for domestic trunkline operations dropped to 49.9 percent, compared to 53.0 percent in the fourth quarter of 1968. System load factor fell to 45.5 percent from 48.7. There are also signs that the industry's improving productivity is currently unable to keep up with the steep rise of costs attributable to inflationary pressures. Operating expenses per available ton-mile were 19.42 cents for the system operations of the domestic trunklines and Pan American, up slightly from 19.16 cents in the fourth quarter of 1968, although for domestic trunk operations alone the reported cost per available ton-mile declined by 1.5 percent. On the other hand, expense per revenue ton-mile for system operations rose by 6.5 percent in the latest calendar year.

For the supplemental carrier group, revenues per ton-mile dropped 2.2 percent while expenses increased 10.6 percent with the result that for the calendar year 1969, operating profit per ton-mile decline 86.7 percent.

Traffic growth remained below industry expectations.—In contrast to the 12–13 percent traffic growth predicted for 1969 by the trunk air carriers, the percentage gains of traffic for the year were 9.7 percent for system operations of the domestic trunk airlines and Pan American, 9.3 percent for the domestic trunk airlines (including some Hawaii traffic in 1969 for newly certificated carriers), and 11.3 percent for the international passenger cargo carriers. Gains were 14.5 percent for the local service carriers. Fourth quarter rates of growth were below the year to date increases, especially for the domestic trunk carriers.

Seat-mile capacity continued to increase at high, disproportionate rates.—The growth of capacity for the fourth quarter of 1969 was 16.2 percent for system operations of the trunks and Pan American, 16.6 percent for domestic operations of the domestic trunks, and 17.6 percent for local service. The percentage gains for the quarter were slightly higher than the year to date increases. For fourth quarter 1969, system operations of the trunks and Pan American reveal the following changes from 1968: revenue passenger-miles up 8.6 percent; available seat-miles up 16.2 percent; average available seats per aircraft up 2.0 percent; and resulting passenger load factor down 3.2 points to 45.5 percent.

The spread between actual and breakeven passenger load factors continued to narrow. Actual passenger load factor fell sharply during the fourth quarter of 1969. Declines ranged from a 3.6 percentage point drop for the domestic trunks to a 1.2 percentage point drop for the local service carriers. Except for the local service carriers, breakeven load factor fell less sharply or increased during this period, causing a further narrowing of the gap between actual and breakeven. Most significant among the carrier groups were the international passenger and cargo carriers which reported a breakeven load factor 5.2 percentage points higher than the actual load factor for the fourth quarter of 1969 compared with a favorable 1.9 percentage point spread for the same period a year earlier. Of real interest was the fact that the local service carriers saw their deficit position with respect to breakeven load factor improve considerably during the fourth quarter.

Increases in operating expense were generally more than gains in revenue.—Except for the local service carriers, expenses grew faster than revenues during the fourth quarter. Domestic trunks showed a better performance, but this is clouded by inclusion of some Hawaii traffic in the 1969 figures. Expenses increased 15.5 percent for system operations of the domestic trunks and Pan American, 15.0 percent for domestic operations of the trunklines, and 21.1 percent for local service.

Growth of adjusted investment was somewhat less than in recent periods.—Increases in adjusted investment at the end of calendar 1969 were 9.8 percent for system operations of the trunks and Pan American, 6.6 percent for the domestic trunklines, and 13.3 percent for local service. Investment growth was actually lower than the growth of revenues (except for the international and territorial group) resulting in increases in the investment turnover ratio.

Rate of return at year end 1969 continued down.—For the year ended December 1969 all carrier groups registered declines compared with 1968 in the rate of return on adjusted investment, either excluding or including investment tax credits.

Notes:

The figures in this report are based on reports of the carriers, without adjustments for accounting differences among carriers and without adjustments that would normally be made for ratemaking purposes. The amounts shown for operating expenses, net income and investment are, therefore, not necessarily those which either the carriers or the Board would find appropriate in a rate proceeding.

Individual items may not add to total because all parts of the whole are not shown on the tables or because of rounding.

[2] Percentage change not computed because of negative amount.

[3] Long-term debt, stockholder equity, total investment, equipment deposits and capitalized interest (as reported in account 1550 of the Form 41's or as a note to the balance sheet) and adjusted investment for 12 months ended are 5 quarter averages. Quarterly numbers are the average of balances at the beginning and end of the quarter.

[4] Composed of express and excess baggage.

[5] Break-even = Capacity Operating Expense (Passenger), Scheduled Service:

Passenger Load factor, Scheduled Service = {Scheduled Passenger Revenue} − {Traffic operating Expense (passenger), Scheduled service} ÷ {Actual passenger Load factor, Scheduled service}

Traffic Operating Expense (Passenger) (i.e. that expense that varies with load factor) is computed at 10 percent of scheduled passenger revenue for the domestic trunks & International/territorial passenger/cargo carriers and 5 percent of Scheduled Passenger Revenue for the Local Service Carriers.

Weight Break-even Load factor Scheduled Service = Capacity Operating Expense, Scheduled Service:

{Scheduled Revenues − Traffic operating Expense, Scheduled service} ÷ {Actual weight Load factor, Scheduled service}

Traffic Operating Expense (i.e. that expense that varies with load factor) is computed at 10 percent of Scheduled Revenues for Domestic Trunk & International/Territorial Passenger/Cargo Carriers, 5 percent of Scheduled Revenue for Local Service Carriers, and 2 percent of Scheduled Revenue for All-Cargo Carriers.

TUNISIA'S INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 14th anniversary of Tunisia's independence day, and it is a glorous day for the people of the Republic of Tunisia.

This country in North Africa, bordering the Mediterranean, with an area about 50,000 square miles and population about 5 million, has had a long and turbulent history. In 1880 it was brought under the French colonial rule, and in the midst of political turmoil, it enjoyed some prosperity. But the people wanted freedom to shape their own destiny, and at last they attained their goal in 1956. Then Tunisian leaders, headed by their very able and astute statesman Habib Bourguiba, formed a government. The constituent assembly was transformed into a legislative assembly, and Bourguiba was elected chief of state.

For more than a dozen years this patriotic and resourceful statesman has guided the destiny of the Republic of Tunisia, combating internal disaffections and defying external foes. He has managed to keep Tunisia's foes in check and has also succeeded in maintaining his country's good standing among its neighbors and also with the West. The statesmen of the West have valued President Bourguiba's services to the cause of peace and have aided him financially and morally. On its independence day let us hope that peace and stability continue to prevail in the Republic of Tunisia.

GI BILL INCREASE

HON. JOHN M. ZWACH

OF MINNESOTA

Thursday, March 19, 1970

Mr. ZWACH. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to support the adoption of the conference report on H.R. 11959. It is my understanding that the other body will act upon it this week, thus clearing the measure for the President's approval. I hope that President Nixon will quickly approve the bill so that veterans attending school or participating in other types of training will receive their well-deserved and needed increase in monthly allowances.

As a member of the Education and Training Subcommittee of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, it was my privilege to participate from the beginning in the hearings and the executive sessions which produced H.R. 11959. It was a good bill when it was reported from the committee and it is still a good bill, providing as it does a 34.6-percent increase in monthly allowances for veterans, widows, war orphans, wives, and children of totally disabled service-connected veterans enrolled in programs of education or training.

The unmarried veteran enrolled in a farm cooperative training program, for example, and pursuing such training on a full-time basis will have his monthly allowance increased from $105 to $141 monthly. I am disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the conference report did not retain a Senate-passed provision that would have encouraged more young men to participate in farm cooperative training. This provision would have reduced the number of hours of institutional agricultural courses a veteran is required to take while concurrently engaged in agricultural employment. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that the present law requirement of 12 hours a week of institutional training plus full-time farming is more than the average veteran can handle.

It is my understanding, however, that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs has agreed to introduce a bill similar to the Senate provisions on farm training that were deleted from H.R. 11959. I hope this measure will receive early and favorable consideration by the committee.

Mr. Speaker, the conferees are to be commended for their outstanding work in resolving the major differences in the two versions of this bill. I hope it will soon become law.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN—HOW LONG?

HON. WILLIAM J. SCHERLE

THE NUMBER OF FAMILY PHYSICIANS AND DENTISTS ARE DIMINISHING

HON. HENRY HELSTOSKI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, through these past few years many of us have deplored the diminishing numbers of family physicians and family dentists in our society.

These family physicians and dentists were bulwarks of our society. They added to the luster, understanding, and accomplishments of it. They were friends in need in the most trying family situations of sickness and fear.

We miss our family physicians and dentists, but there is hope that growing numbers of them will return to our midst with their ministrations and help. They will if those in the medical and dental professions heed the advice of Dr. Roy Fuhrman, a dentist residing in my congressional district.

These following words of advice by Dr. Fuhrman are contained in the following article taken from the Bulletin of the Bergen County Dental Society, issue of February 1970:

"TOMORROW'S IMAGE TODAY"

(By Roy Fuhrman, D.D.S.)

A serious result of the growing crisis in the doctor-patient relationship is reported in Science News (December 13, 1969–page 552). "Medical malpractice awards are approaching 1.2 million and expected to average $65,000 each in 1970. Malpractice insurance premiums can run up to $10,000 a year!" The report goes on to say, "the root of the problem seems to be the change of the physician from healer to businessman." This obviously includes the dental and other healing professionals. Concentration by our profession toward the objective of the business or corporate image will most assuredly generate a medico-legal no-mans land which can magnify itself into a modern Frankenstein. It is also obvious that this monster casts a dark costly shadow that eats money which could be utilized in far more constructive avenues.

Crawford Morris, a leading malpractice lawyer defends professionls, says that one solution to the problem is to bring all medicine under a clinic or hospital system where all doctors are salaried employees and the institution would be responsible for their acts. To my way of thinking this is a far worse monster than the Frankenstein creation. It would bring on a system where unlicensed administration would control our professions. Does this ring a bell? Enter socialized medicine.

The solution? A closer, more personal relationship with our patients is the only way to reverse the damages if it is not already too late. This means slowing the pace a bit. This means more time per patient. And here is where a good practice management concept comes into the picture. Not for competing with other industries which open the public's purses. Not for the primary objective called profit. But for the simple means of doing more dentistry of very high quality for the fewer patients on our rolls. Thus preventive dentistry can be labelled as a reality and not a dream. Much of the dentistry we do is the redoing of past work of too recent application to fend off as normal attrition. If the work redone had been more carefully and perhaps more slowly performed in the first place, it is simple logic to expect more quality with longer lasting results.

One of the major Practice Management companies showed me how to cut down on my top-heavy schedule—reduce working hours—and do more and better dentistry than I imagined I could. Absolutely no change in equipment was suggested or required. The only change was in my attitude concerning my practice and in making longer appointments for my patients. There was no mention of competition or money markets. These entities are not and really never could be in the dental universe. When the day arrives that a human being is as happy about submitting to dental treatment as he is about the purchase of a hot stock or a new car I'll believe in the need for dentists to compete with other so-called markets!

There is nothing attractive about dentistry from the patient's point of view except its good and long-lasting results. Burn this statement into your minds. It is the truth about our profession. There are no "Ben Casey" stories about dentists on television for a good reason. Certainly we can stop pain, improve mastication, build a beautiful new smile, correct speech problems, etc. . . . but we do not qualify as movie or television heroes. This may seem amusing but it should tell us something about the way the public sees dentistry. Some of us apparently never get the message. So I'll repeat it here. The necessary manipulations of the dentist are such that to the layman they are unappealing, unattractive, frightening, annoying, painful, time consuming, exhausting, malodorous, bad tasting, evil-sounding, expensive, and generally very undesirable. I doubt if we could find another field of endeavor, be it profession or business, so loaded with negative properties. We dentists should be proud of our abilities to successfully perform in an environment so subjectively antagonistic to the human organism. Let's also give our patients some credit too for being heroic enough to go through with any extensive dental treatment program and pay for it as agreed upon.

We are therefore competing not with other markets, but with the negative aspect of our own profession which to the public, represents the bulk of the work we train so hard to become expert in doing. Compassion with a reasonable measure of altruism can offset a large part of this apprehension concerning dentistry.

A businessman's approach to reducing this negative image will only serve to enforce the growing fears and mistrust that the public feels for the healing professions in general.

Recent exposures of municipal leaders involved with high crime, exposes proving corporate giants not serving the public interest, unparalleled increases in the cost of living—with the cost of health care at the top of the list; all these problems make the consumer wary and suspicious of the motives of everyone he deals with. Rest assured, gentlemen, dentists are included as are all those who deal in personal services. Professional ethics therefore becomes more important today than it ever has been in the past. We must constantly strive to prove our integrity. We must maintain a level of ethical vigilance that is higher than it has ever been before in the history of our profession. If not . . . and the warning signs are all too visible . . . we shall be forced to relinquish that which by definition makes us a profession. Self regulation will fall by the wayside. The matter will simply be taken out of our hands by an angry and frustrated society. Our coveted license to practice our art will become a bureaucratic rubber stamp. We will practice dentistry as administrative employees of frequently incompetent and grossly untrained lay supervisors.

It is true that highly publicized programs such as Children's Dental Health Week are helping to improve our image publicly. But it is at the daily private clinical level that the real job can and must be done. Public relations is part of the daily working landscape of every (practicing) member of our profession. Let's rip off the facade of the businessman and proudly display the real fellow behind all that modern complicated equipment. The family dentist; a professional man who can truly be relied upon to do his utmost to preserve and maintain the oral structures of all those who seek his services.

STATEMENTS OF PRESIDENTS OPPOSE INVOLVEMENT IN LAOS

HON. JOE L. EVINS

OF TENNESSEE

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. EVINS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Clayton Fritchey in a recent article in the Washington Star cites the record of President Nixon and former Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, and Johnson with respect to involvement in the Indochina area and Laos.

In this column Mr. Fritchey points out—

That President Nixon has vowed that Laos will not be another Vietnam;

That President Eisenhower said intervention in the Indochina area which includes Laos would be a "great tragedy";

That President Kennedy said, "I just don't think we should get involved in Laos," and

That President Johnson was strongly opposed to intervention in Laos.

Because of the interest of my colleagues and the American people in this matter, I place the article in the RECORD herewith.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Star, Mar. 16, 1970]

PAST RECORD FOSTERS UNEASINESS OVER LAOS

(By Clayton Fritchey)

Sen. Stephen M. Young, D-Ohio, says "Laos is not worth the life of one American soldier." Almost 10 years ago, before the war in Vietnam, then Secretary of State Dean Rusk liked to say that "Laos is not worth the life of a single Kansas farm boy." Rusk and Young are in distinguished company, for much the same thing was said by three presidents in a row.

In 1954, Eisenhower said it would be a "great tragedy" to intervene in Indochina, which embraced both Laos and Vietnam. Lyndon Johnson, then Democratic Senate leader, was even more opposed; and when John F. Kennedy entered the White House he felt Laos was not "worthy of engaging the attention of great powers."

Historian Arthur Schlesinger reports that Kennedy wondered why the United States should "fight for a country whose people could not care less about fighting for themselves." He also found it "hard to understand why the United States had to take the responsibility." Kennedy said, "India's more directly threatened than we are; and, if they are not wildly excited, why should we be?" Why, indeed?

Yet, after all these years, the United States today finds itself at war not only in Vietnam but in Laos, because Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson despite their grave doubts each inched the country deeper and deeper into the quicksand of Southeast Asia without ever consulting the American people.

It is this unhappy experience that explains why so many senators of both parties, now alarmed over the growing "secret" involvement in Laos, are so skeptical about President Nixon's assurances that he doesn't intend to let Laos become another Vietnam.

War, like hell, is paved with presidential good intentions. Democrats, in particular, have good reason to be skeptical, for three Democratic presidents campaigned on peace platforms—in 1916, 1940 and 1964—and a year later all three were presiding over wars. The uneasiness over Nixon's intentions is magnified because he has been a laos-Vietnam hawk for 16 years. As vice president in 1954, Nixon (unlike Eisenhower) was openly advocating armed intervention in Indochina.

Seven years later, just after the Bay of Pigs disaster of April 1961, Nixon in a White House visit urged on President Kennedy an invasion of Cuba and "a commitment of American air power" to Laos. According to Nixon himself, Kennedy replied, "I just don't think we ought to get involved in Laos, particularly where we might find ourselves fighting millions of Chinese troops in the jungles. In any event, I don't see how we can make any move in Laos, 5,000 miles away, if we don't make a move in Cuba only 90 miles away."

Both Nixon and Secretary of State Rogers now are trying to quiet the fears of Congress, but Sen. J. W. Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said he had been "scared to death" by the private contention of a high-ranking administration official that Laos was more important to the United States than Vietnam.

The Senate majority leader, Mike Mansfield, Senators Stuart Symington, Albert Gore, George McGovern, and other Democratic spokesmen, are, in the words of Gore, "very afraid we are gradually being sucked into a new Vietnam-type war."

The White House, which thought it had the issue safely damped down, is obviously disturbed by the turn of events, for it can sense that the growing anxiety over Laos also is raising fresh doubts about the soundness of the administration's so-called Vietnamization policy.

The weakness of this strategy has always been that it could be upset by Hanoi, not only by new initiatives in South Vietnam but in Korea, or Thailand, or Laos. Nixon can counter (as he has warned) by sharply escalating the war, but he then will be embracing the policy that cost Johnson the presidency.

FEBRUARY PARITY

HON. JOHN M. ZWACH

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. ZWACH. Mr. Speaker, recently the parity average figure for February 1970 was released. I am happy to note that it is a 75-percent average compared to a 73-percent average, a year ago at this time.

While the average is 2 percent higher than last year, I am not satisfied that it did not climb above the January figure which was also 75 percent. Only when the farmers of this Nation receive a full 100-percent parity, will they be earning a true and honest income for the efforts they extend in feeding the families of this Nation.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with my usual custom, I hereby insert the parity figures for February:

PARITY, FEBRUARY 1970

IT IS FOR THE BIRDS BUT GONE TO THE DOGS

HON. ODIN LANGEN

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. LANGEN. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion in recent months about the validity of numerous research projects being financed in whole or in part by public funds.

Two questions immediately arise that are deserving of fair and honest answers. First, are these research projects really needed, and second, have the results of such studies justified the money expended?

Of course, there are those who would come to the defense of any and every research project, claiming that this is a noble effort to expand man's fund of knowledge.

Such logic is purposefully designed to be disarming—after all, who will admit to being against knowledge, or mother, or flag, for that matter. But such reasoning is rather spurious on second thought, and one wonders to what limits of absurdity we might go in the name of science and progress. Particularly where public funds are involved, we must impassionately ascertain the probable cost-value ratio of each endeavor.

But have research projects to date been subjected to critical examination? Needless to say there is much research today that is most important—no one would question the urgent need to conquer cancer, for example.

Unfortunately, things are not all that clearly cut, and I am convinced that much needs to be done to tighten controls over all types of research conducted at public expense, lest we continue to lay eggs, like the example below.

There has been concern for some time that centers of basic and applied research have been too narrowly concentrated within a few geographical areas in the United States, hence the decision to establish a broad program to develop new centers at heretofore excluded institutions of higher learning. Altogether 118 such programs have been initiated at 76 universities in the United States, and by this action project THEMIS was given the breath of life by the Defense Department.

As part of this program the University of Mississippi was awarded a grant of $600,000 to study the possible use of birds to replace humans in jobs which might be dangerous or "boring."

Again, on first reflection this might sound somewhat reasonable—after all, is it not true that pigeons have been used successfully in past wars as couriers?

But what has become of this feathery episode? To start with, we must seriously question the very legitimacy of such a large expenditure, since the Department of Defense at first claimed that the program was not directed at developing a specific operational military system or device, but rather for the generalized, nebulous, and I might say evasive purpose of building a "better understanding of how to meet a variety of current and future military tasks." Taken from a GAO report.

Now, would someone care to step forward and explain what that means, and also to justify the spending of over a half million dollars of the taxpayers' money for this scheme?

Well, apparently the Defense Department has had some second thoughts of its own, since we now find that, first of all, the project has been cut back from $600,000 to $500,000 and even more surprising, they have decided to give up on the birds and will instead concentrate on the use of dogs. Why? The answer is simple, says the Air Force Office of Scientific Research: "So that more immediate useful application of the research can be realized."

Exit some disillusioned birds and $600,000 which has flown the U.S. Treasury coup.

KINGDOM OF MOROCCO

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, the sovereign Kingdom of Morocco in northwest Africa was created on March 2, 1956. King Hassan II became the monarch in 1961 and his country became a constitutional monarchy under a constitution approved by referendum in December 1962. The first parliament was elected by universal vote in May 1963.

Morocco is one of the most beautiful and historic countries in Africa. Over half a million tourists are attracted annually to see its casbahs, Roman ruins, old fortresses and oases. The Riff and Atlas mountain ranges have long been celebrated. The country is primarily agricultural and pastoral. It is second to the United States in production of phosphate rock and is first in phosphate exports. It is a significant producer of cobalt. Carpets, leather goods, and silk products are among the manufactures.

We salute the Kingdom of Morocco on the 14th anniversary of the declaration of March 2, 1956.

BRONISLAW BREMENSTUL

HON. HENRY HELSTOSKI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. HELSTOSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Polish community of the Ninth Congressional District of New Jersey lost a very able and leading citizen when Bronislaw Bremenstul passed away on March 15.

Mr. Bremenstul was one of the most friendly persons it has been my opportunity to meet, and I admired his sincerity and honesty in fighting for the things he believed in very deeply.

As a friend, he was loyal, courteous, and accommodating. His devotion to the United States of America was unquestioned, and his loyalty to the Democratic Party was most avid.

In his life, Bronislaw Bremenstul was a patriot of the first order. In death, he bequeaths to his fellow Poles and Americans a legacy of outstanding civic achievement.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to pay tribute to a great Polish-American and I know that he will be missed in East Bergen. We will miss his warmth, his courtesy, his conviction.

Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I insert his obituary, which appeared on the day after his death:

BRONISLAW BREMENSTUL—POLISH-AMERICAN LEADER WAS 75

Bronislaw Bremenstul, 408 Sherman pl., Fairview, a leading figure in the Polish-American Community of East Bergen for many years, died yesterday at Englewood Hospital. He was 75.

Mr. Bremenstul was president of the Polish American Democratic Club of Cliffside Park. Having been instrumental in organizing the club in 1929, he served as president from its inception for a period of 12 years. After that he was president for a total of 30 years.

Born in Poland Jan. 15, 1895, he migrated to the United States in 1913 at the age of 18, making his home in New York City. He became a naturalized citizen in 1922 and joined the Polish Democratic Club in the Eighth Assembly District, New York City, the same year. He moved to Fairview in 1926. Though he was retired at the time of his death, he had worked for the Grove Meat and Provision Co. for 40 years.

Mr. Bremenstul was a member of Fairview Board of Health, having served four years during the Mayor Francis Munley administration. For the past few years, he served as a crossing guard.

A member of the Polish-American Welfare Council of Cliffside Park-Fairview for the past 33 years, he also served as its delegate and was a committee member for the Pulaski Day parade in New York City annually. He was an honorary member of the Bergen County Democratic Club.

Mr. Bremenstul was one of the four stalwarts honored at a dinner sponsored by the Men's Democratic Club of Bergen County on Oct. 25, 1962, at the Neptune Inn, Paramus. He also had been honored at a testimonial dinner and awarded a plaque by his own organization.

He also was president and headed the board of directors of the Polish National Home, St. Mark's pl., New York City; member of Polish American Democratic Club of New York and St. Joseph's Society Group 60 of Cliffside Park.

Surviving are his wife, Marie (nee Prechitko); a son, Ludwig, who is a construction engineer in New Orleans, La., and a daughter, Mrs Joan Dolecki of Fairview, secretary to Fairview schools superintendent; a sister and a nephew in Poland. Six grandchildren also survive.

Mr. Speaker, upon the loss of a husband, father, and grandfather, I express my deepest sorrows and my condolences to his wife, Marie; his son, Ludwig; his daughter, Mrs. Joan Dolecki; and to the six grandchildren who survive him.

JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT AND OPERATION HOLLAND

OF NEW JERSEY

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, many of our colleagues will recall previous occasions on which I have been privileged to bring to their attention the remarkable work of Junior Achievement of Union County, N.J., through its annual youth incentive and economic education award projects.

As elsewhere in the country, Junior Achievement in Union County aims at providing practical experience for high-school-age boys and girls in the establishment and operation of their own profitmaking business establishments.

This learn-by-doing activity—encouraged and supported by adult business leaders—has enjoyed great success in acquainting young Americans with the challenge and the opportunity and the satisfaction of participating in the private enterprise economy.

In Union County, however, Junior Achievement has reached a kind of zenith, due to the skill and imagination of its adult staff and board of directors and the generous and constant support of the business, financial and industrial community of the area, which I have found nowhere else.

Entitled "Operation Holland," this year's Junior Achievement project will be climaxed by a weeklong visit to Holland by the 30 to 35 award winners—boys and girls whose individual achievements with their junior companies earned them this recognition. In Holland, they will be hosted by a number of major industrial firms, including Merck, Sharp & Dohme, Ford, GAF, Esso, and KLM, whose officials will introduce them to the dynamic life of The Netherlands through that country's industrial, educational, cultural, and scientific activities—thereby further preparing young Americans to assume the responsibilities that will soon be theirs.

Through the cooperation of Harry P. Frank, publisher of the Daily Journal of Elizabeth, N.J., and a member of JA's board of directors, I am proud to include as a part of my remarks in the RECORD the JA bulletin outlining "Operation Holland" and an article from the Newark Star-Ledger describing the program.

I recommend them to our colleagues as an invaluable source of information about a most constructive and effective way of involving young people in activities whose benefits will follow them throughout their lives.

The article and bulletin follow:

STUDENTS GET A PRIMER ON FREE ENTERPRISE

(By John Soloway)

Once again Junior Achievement of Union County Inc., aided and abetted admirably by business and industrial leaders of the area, has come up with a project with merit and muscle on behalf of the American competitive private enterprise system.

This dynamic and well-conceived youth incentive and economic education project is called Operation Holland. It will send some 35 boys and girls of high school age on a week-long visit to industrial, educational and cultural centers in The Netherlands.

Philip C. Osterman, president of Junior Achievement of Union County, in announcing the project said:

"For some time now our American competitive enterprise system has been under attack from some quarters. As has been said time and again, free enterprise needs better informed and more dedicated believers. Whether our system continues to flourish, or whether the props are pulled out from under it, depends upon how well our youth understand it, and how vigorously they defend it."

He continued, "Thus far Junior Achievement is the brightest hope of preserving our system unimpaired."

As in previous similar projects, some 900 students from 23 public and parochial high schools in the county are already actively competing for a coveted spot among the award winners who will visit Holland next spring.

Winners will be selected on the basis of overall competence in their Junior Achievement activities including production and sales, safety, new and creative ideas to improve their junior company operations and reduce operating costs, attendance records, punctuality, and a generally high degree of excellence in all phases of Junior Achievements activity.

The project gets off the ground next May when the Junior Achievers selected for the trip will take off via HLM Royal Dutch Airlines for Amsterdam International Airport and their visit to the Amsterdam and Rotterdam areas of Holland.

Junior Achievement's Operation Holland has the support not only of business and industrial leaders of New Jersey, but the blessings of the Hon. John Middendorf II, American ambassador to The Netherlands, and his staff, according to J. Kenneth Roden, executive vice president of JA of Union County.

It ought to be noted here that Ken Roden, who has more than just a flair for public relations, is the pappy of Operation Holland and the several similar projects which preceded it.

Coordinator for the upcoming project in The Netherlands is John Barens, director of government liaison for Merck Sharp & Dohme Nederland N. V.

Enthusiastic support and cooperation have already been assured by Dutch industrialists including J. F. A. DeSoet, deputy general manager, KLM Royal Dutch Airlines; J. W. H. Langenberg, vice president of Rhine-Schelde Engineering & Ship Builders Ltd; Alfred Knol, Arthur Andersen & Co.; L. V. Assiter, Austin-Nederlands N. V., Chris R. Bagchus, Esso Netherlands; John V. Schen, Esso Chemie N. V.; Roel Van Der Velde, Ford of Holland; Marinus Schouten, GAF Nederland; Dr. J. Ph. Backx, Scheepvaart Vereeniging Zuid (Rotterdam Port Employers' Association, and American Cyanamid Co's. installation in The Netherlands.

Junior Achievement's New Jersey sponsors participating in the project are: Airco Welding Products Division, Arthur Andersen & Co., The Austin Co., Bell Telephone Laboratories, Holmdel and Murray Hill installations.

Also, Bristol-Myers Products, Burry Biscuit, Chevron Oil Co., CIBA Corp., The Daily Journal, Enjay Chemical Co., FMC Corp., GAF Corp., General Motors Assembly and New Departure-Hyatt Bearings, General Electric, Humble Oil & Refining Co., IBM, Merck & Co.

Also, New Jersey Bell Telephone, Phelps Dodge Copper Products, New Jersey Chapter of Public Relations Society of America, Public Service Electric & Gas, Purchasing Agents Association of North Jersey, Purolator Inc., Quinn & Boden Co.

Also, Radio Corporation of America, Schering Laboratories Division of Schering Corp., Peter J. Schweitzer Division of Kimberly-Clark Corp., Simmons Co., Singer Co., Union County Chapter of Certified Public Accountants, Wayne Steel Co., Weston Instruments and White-Pharmaco and Young Presidents Organization.

AWARD WINNING JUNIOR ACHIEVERS TO VISIT HOLLAND—WHERE THE GOOD LIVING BEGINS

Junior Achievement is a dynamic, positive program which develops a better understanding of how business operates, its problems, its rewards, and its invaluable contributions to a better life for all people.

There is a definite and continuing need for all who are associated with Junior Achievement to inspire our young people to rededicate themselves to the principles of Free Enterprise. We must effectively teach and demonstrate that our Free Enterprise System is not just a system for carrying on business but much more: The best system for promoting human progress while preserving individual freedom—the system which leads the world in industrial growth and high standards of living.

AN INCENTIVE FOR JUNIOR ACHIEVERS

Operation Holland is a three-pronged youth incentive, economic education, and public relations project. It will continue throughout the Junior Achievement program year. It will be climaxed with a week-long visit to Holland, beginning May 23, 1970, by about 30 to 35 Junior Achievers accompanied by adult advisers from industry.

In Holland the Junior Achievers will have an opportunity to develop personal knowledge of the industrial, educational, scientific and cultural activities of The Netherlands. They will return better prepared to assume their future responsibilities as voters, community leaders, employees and managers in a world where international relationships are becoming increasingly more important.

The group will meet with Dutch business, industrial, educational and government leaders, and their families. Arrangements are being worked out in cooperation with the Honorable John William Middendorf II, American Ambassador to The Hague; John Bovey, Jr., Chargé d'Affaires at the U.S. Embassy; John Barens, Merck Sharp & Dohme, Nederland NV; J.W.A. Longenberg, Rhine-Schelde Engineers & Shipbuilders Ltd., and other prominent Dutch and American businessmen.

Extensive press, radio and television coverage, locally and in Holland is being planned throughout this program year, as well as during the visit to Holland.

WHY HOLLAND?

Because Holland, for centuries occupying a central place of commercial activities, has become an industrial country of major importance. Only 15,450 square miles, much of it below sea level on land reclaimed from the sea, Holland is at the estuary of the most important navigable rivers of Western Europe. Emphasis is shifting from the traditional textile, ship building, and food industries to chemical, metallurgical, petroleum, and electrochemical industries.

Our Junior Achievement group has been invited to visit industrial installations, schools and cultural sites. Arrangements will be made for the Junior Achievers to meet with students and to be guests in homes of executives and officials of the host organizations.

A most important phase of the visit will be a day spent with industrialists at their places of business and participation in discussions of production techniques, management responsibilities, and employment opportunities.

OBJECTIVES OF OPERATION HOLLAND

Operation Holland has been planned and developed by the Board of Directors of Junior Achievement of Union County to meet our present-day challenges. Its objectives are:

(1) To provide Junior Achievers and Advisers with a positive educational and incentive program designed to stimulate full understanding of the principles, motivations and rewards of Free Enterprise.

Operation Holland will demonstrate that every individual, employee, manager, or community leader, must be ever aware that the vigor of our private enterprise system depends upon a heritage that attaches prime importance to opportunity for the individual, personal initiative, responsibility and competence. It will demonstrate that people are the priceless asset of any business organization and that each human being is a unique talent which, given an opportunity for expression, can add value to a company.

(2) To give Junior Achievers actively engaged in owning and operating their own junior companies an opportunity to feel the pulsebeat of industry and international trade, and to learn first-hand the economic facts of life in business at home and abroad.

Emphasis will be on the need for profits and a high level of individual competence and productivity, without errors. The effect of business profits upon the everyday lives of young people, their families, and the community and the economy as a whole will be stressed.

Operation Holland will demonstrate that each individual's contribution, if properly utilized, will result in a profit to himself, to his employer, to the community and nation. It will further assure continued growth, prosperity and stability of the economy and will show how corporate profits become job producers.

The experience of international travel by jet aircraft will demonstrate to the Junior Achievers how, under the Free Enterprise system, research and development in the transportation industry and aggressive promotion, have advanced international trade, travel and communications and narrowed the world's horizons, thus improving human relationships.

(3) To have successful businessmen, experienced in the various stages of education and business advancement, convince the Junior Achievers of the dollars and cents value of a high school diploma and to demonstrate clearly the increased income and opportunities available to those who obtain higher education or seek technical or specialized training.

The project will demonstrate how profitable and essential continued education can be and how short-range thinking with emphasis on short-term income opportunities and job security, without personal initiative and productivity and responsible leadership, fail to develop the full potential of the individual.

(4) To maintain the high standards of performance, productivity, and prestige of the Junior Achievement program.

Special emphasis will be placed on stimulating superior performance at all levels of Junior Achievement activity, development of personal initiative, creative thinking, resonsible leadership, good attendance, punctuality and accuracy. Improved production techniques to reduce operating costs will be encouraged. Aggressive safety and quality control programs will be required. Sales incentive programs will be emphasized.

(5) To demonstrate to Junior Achievers, parents, educators and the community at large the degree of interest which local businessmen have in young people, and to give recognition to business and industrial sponsors and supporters of Junior Achievement for their unselfish efforts on behalf of young people.

This program will demonstrate to the community that local business and industrial organizations are good neighbors, willing to help prepare young people to accept responsibilities of business management and professional and community leadership.

There will be widespread publicity about Operation Holland and opportunities for good employee and community relations will be initiated by Junior Achievement on behalf of its sponsors and other participants.

(6) To give Junior Achievers an opportunity to become goodwill ambassadors and to feel first-hand the pulsebeat of international relations.

The Junior Achievers will develop a keener understanding of the importance of sincere cooperation in international relations in all areas: human relations, government, and particularly business and industry. They will be introduced to the many aspects of life outside the United States through their visits and association with businessmen and professional people, government officials and educational groups.

COMMUNITY PARTICIPATION

There will be extensive community participation in Operation Holland. Every effort will be made to stimulate the entire community to rededicate themselves to the principles of Free Enterprise.

NOMINATIONS AND SELECTION OF ACHIEVERS FOR THE AWARD TRIP

In April outstanding Junior Achievers will be selected for the award trip, scheduled to begin May 23. The deadline for nominations will be 9 p.m. Thursday, April 2. Judging of nominees is scheduled for Saturday, April 11.

Provided that the Junior Achievement company and its individual Junior Achiever members have met the standards set forth in the Performance Standards Bulletin, the company will have the privilege of nominating members for participation in the Operation Holland award trip. Consideration should be given only to outstanding Junior Achievers based on performance and achievement in the following areas:

Leadership.

Personal initiative and creating thinking.

Appearance, grooming, poise.

Ability to get along with young people and adults.

Originality of products.

Production and sales techniques and their successful application.

Attendance and punctuality.

Adherence to and proper execution of safety regulations.

Good quality control.

Accuracy of company records.

Knowledge of Junior Achievement company operations.

Knowledge of sponsoring company's activities.

Knowledge and understanding of the values, workings and benefits to the individual of the Free Enterprise System.

Knowledge of the history, culture and economic development of Holland.

Future educational and employment plans of the Junior Achiever and degree to which they are being implemented.

The degree of personal participation in bringing the Junior Achievement company into full participation in Operation Holland should be an important factor in the selection of nominees. Bear in mind that the Junior Achievers who visit Holland will be representatives of our industrial and educational community and will be guests of important citizens there.

A nomination form will be provided by Junior Achievement with instructions for completion and the due date.

All nominees will be interviewed by a special Junior Achievement Awards Panel, at a time and place to be specified by Junior Achievement. Decisions of the Judges will be final.

Selection of Junior Achievers who will participate in the award trip will be announced about three weeks in advance, when instructions will be issued for obtaining written permission from parents or guardians. Travel requirements, including passport and health certificate, and other pre-trip details will be discussed.

INCENTIVE PROGRAM COMMITTEE

The Board of Directors of Junior Achievement of Union County has delegated responsibility for the planning and execution of Operation Holland to Mr. J. Kenneth Roden, Executive Vice President. He will be responsible for liaison with American and Dutch government officials and agencies, and other participating organizations.

The Board of Directors has named a Committee to advise and assist Mr. Roden. Members of the Incentive Program Committee are:

James D. Abeles, President, Purolator Inc.

John Hallahan, President, New Jersey Chapter, Public Relations Society of America.

William M. Bristol III, Group Vice President, Bristol-Myers Company.

John J. Conlon, Vice President, Phelps Dodge Copper Products Corporation.

Harry P. Frank, Publisher, The Daily Journal.

CLOSING OF U.S. CONSULATE IN RHODESIA

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, it was very heartening to those of us dedicated to the principle of equal rights for all to note our Government's recent action in closing the U.S. consulate in Rhodesia. I find the continuing efforts of the illegal government in Salisbury to deny proper representation to that country's black population a gross affront to justice and human dignity. In this connection, I would like to include in the RECORD an excellent editorial from the New Jersey Afro-American of March 21, 1970, commenting on the issue:

A CONSULATE CLOSES

The United States took a step in the right direction with the closing of the consulate in Rhodesia. A number of other governments already have taken similar action.

When Rhodesia on March 2 declared itself a republic, it told the world that a few hundred thousand whites would attempt to continue indefinitely to hold millions of blacks in bondage in the latter's own country.

While American men fight and die because the government says the U.S. must help preserve self-determination for the South Vietnamese, it would have been hypocritical beyond diplomatic explanation to have continued our consulate in Rhodesia.

However, the action taken does not begin to meet the responsibility of the United States in southern Africa.

Congressmen Charles C. Diggs, D–Mich. and Jonathan B. Bingham D–N.Y. put the situation in perspective when they said in a joint statement:

"We hope that this initiative will be followed by the United States continuing to fight to implement principles of racial equality and self determination. The closing of the consulate must be the catalyst to ensure the necessary changes, not only in Rhodesia but throughout southern Africa.

"The United States must strengthen sanctions against Ian Smith's illegal white regime. The United States must discourage investment and trade with the South African government. The United States must strengthen her relations with majority ruled nations in southern Africa. The United States must urge Portugal to decolonize Mozambique and Angola. The United States must urge South Africa to surrender the mandated territory of South Africa."

Unless the United States moves in these directions, the two congressmen suggest, the closing of the consulate "will have little meaning."

They are right.

REPORT TO CONSTITUENTS

HON. LESTER L. WOLFF

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Speaker, regularly I report to my constituents on important national issues and my activities in Washington. Under leave to extend my remarks I wish to include my most recent report in the RECORD. It follows:

MARCH 1970.

DEAR FRIEND AND CONSTITUENT: In this regular issue of my Washington newsletter I would like to discuss with you the disturbing problem of our faltering national economy. Since Long Island's much publicized economic woes are really symptomatic of a much larger national problem, our local situation is directly tied to policy decisions made in Washington.

As I shall explain in detail, the national economic picture is bleak. Moreover, if the discredited policies of tight money and unemployment are not discarded we face greater unemployment, continued inflation and more costly welfare expenditures stemming from increased joblessness. The situation is an outgrowth of economic policies pursued by the past and present Administrations.

These policy decisions have been aimed, although quite poorly aimed, at the problem of inflation. As you realize every time you go to the supermarket inflation has not been controlled. And now in addition we are faced with the possibility of recession.

To fight the spectre of a full-scale recession—to end the unprecedented combination of high inflation and high unemployment—to set our economy on the right path—I propose the following:

Reorder our national priorities to yield a net reduction in federal spending. This can be done by ending unnecessary, wasteful programs and diverting a portion of the savings to essential domestic programs.

End unsurious interest rates.

Reject the callous and counter-productive policy of deliberately creating unemployment.

End the federal income tax surcharge.

These points are explained in detail inside. As always your comments and opinions are most welcome. Best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

LESTER L. WOLFF,
Your Congressman.

UNEMPLOYMENT

The economic situation on Long Island is approaching a critical stage, with unemployment already above the national average and substantial layoffs and plant closings expected. Unemployment could well affect six percent of the Long Island working force in the near future.

This is symptomatic of the economic slowdown being felt throughout the country. This slowdown, considered by some economists to be a full-scale recession, is the consequence of the government's poor fiscal and monetary policies in 1969.

This February the national unemployment rate rose to 4.2 percent with continuing increases likely through 1970. On Long Island the rate is even higher.

The Administration has deliberately created unemployment. This was indicated when the President's Council of Economic Advisors appeared before a Congressional Committee and maintained that "a moderate rise in unemployment is necessary to start winding down inflation." (Business Week, Feb. 21, 1970)

Rising unemployment is more than a statistic; it means millions of Americans anxious to work cannot find jobs. These people see their savings wiped out and their dreams shattered. Unemployment also means increased costs to government through public assistance paid through your taxes.

I reject the notion that unemployment is necessary to stop inflation. I believe we can return to "full employment" and still stop inflation by preparing the federal budget with new perspectives meaning substantial cuts in non-essential spending.

HIGH INTEREST RATES

But to date tight money has been the main weapon of the present Administration in fighting inflation and it has not worked.

The experience of usurious high interest rates has been to fuel, rather than slow, inflation since the higher cost of borrowing has been passed to the consumer in the form of higher prices. As far back as 1967 I joined with Chairman Wright Patman, of the House Banking and Currency Committee, in forming a committee of Congressmen to fight high interest rates. We maintained our efforts to lower interest rates and in this session of Congress I introduced legislation calling on the Administration and Federal Reserve Board to abandon the unsuccessful and self-destructive high interest rate policy.

HOME BUILDING

In the one area in which high interest rates have slowed the economy, the effect has been much greater than desirable. The home building industry has been severely hit by the lack of mortgage money and housing starts declined last year by 36 percent.

This hits Long Island which is mostly populated by individual home owners. The situation is so desperate that veterans returning from Vietnam cannot find mortgage money to purchase homes.

TAX SURCHARGE

But the beginnings of the problem go back to the inflation of the latter years of the Johnson Administration. President Johnson thought he could control inflation with a tax surcharge, but as we have found out the hard way this is not the answer.

I voted against the original surcharge proposal and have voted against it each time it was brought before the Congress. The surcharge has not controlled inflation and leaves you—the taxpayer—in the continuing unfair position of paying inflated prices out of a deflated paycheck.

VIETNAM WAR

It must be noted that the main source of the original inflationary pressures in this cycle came from the costs of the Vietnam war. No matter how it is disguised there can be no doubt that the cost of this war, now over $100,000,000,000.00, has drained our resources without a resolution or end in sight. In fact, under present policies we face years of added support for a Vietnamese government riddled with corruption that no "Vietnamization" can correct.

REORDER FEDERAL BUDGET

As I indicated above, a major overhaul of the federal budget is the best solution for inflation and unemployment. Much can be eliminated from the federal budget while we step up some programs and realize a net reduction in spending. Reductions are possible in these areas:

(1) A $4.5 billion a year farm subsidy (welfare) programs that pays large farmers to plow food under while there is hunger here and abroad. Some corporate farms receive annual payments of more than one million dollars for not producing.

(2) "Pork barrel" public works that are among the most flagrantly wasteful and unnecessary spending programs. If the Administration is serious about cutting spending it can start here and save more than two billion dollars.

(3) Defense spending not related to our national security should be cut from the budget—this program that now takes 40% of your tax dollar was never intended as a WPA or relief program. Its purpose is our national security. Let me emphasize that programs necessary to our security deserve our full and unfailing support. But there is much excess "fat" that can be cut without compromising our national interests. This is the largest part of our budget—more than $70 billion—and thus the area where the greatest cuts can be made.

For example, proposals have been made for expansion of the Safeguard ABM system which could cost $100 billion. Yet no one knows if this system will work.

There are also the problems of unnecessary "extras" (cost overruns-C5A) and unsound programs in the Defense Department (programs often abandoned after billions are spent-Cheyenne Helicopter).

These are just some of the many ways the federal budget can be cut. So that we would devote attention to domestic needs we could direct a portion of the money saved toward:

Environmental protection and pollution control;

Improved education and help to offset unreasonably high school taxes;

Rapid mass transit to finally end the LIRR nightmare;

More and better housing; and

An end to hunger and the elimination of urban and rural poverty.

By ending waste in the federal budget we will have the money for programs of dire necessity and still accomplish a net reduction in spending. This is why the "flap" over the health and education budget was shameful. Cutting this budget while wasting billions elsewhere was a cynical and unnecessary affront to the American people who need improved educational facilities and help in paying the soaring cost of education.

To control inflation and return to full employment we need:

An end to Administration wavering on the wage-price spiral. Instead of ignoring, as the Administration has thus far, this fundamental means of attacking inflation we must immediately study how to check the spiral. I have introduced legislation for a review of the desirability of action in this area.

Reductions in federal spending as outlined above.

Reductions in food and medical costs—the areas most hit by inflation.

A further reduction in the "discriminatory" oil depletion allowance which protects the special interests of the oil lobby.

An end to the federal income tax surcharge.

Six percent prime lending and home mortgage rates ceiling.

Establishment of national welfare standards to cut costs in public assistance.

Now to aid those unemployed and to minimize the cost of public assistance we should:

Increase job training and retraining programs and see that individuals are paid while learning new skills. I am pleased that the President has acted in this direction.

Provide additional day care centers so mothers willing and able to work can do so.

Aid in relocating those who lose jobs.

Most importantly, the government can save money, get the manpower for domestic projects, cut the welfare burden, and aid the economy by being the employer of last resort. People should not be unemployed, nor should those able to work be receiving welfare and not working when we need hospitals, schools, mass transportation, etc.

To sum this up briefly, by cutting the "fat" out of federal spending problems, by reordering our national priorities, by discarding outdated economic theories and by ending the crass acceptance of unemployment—we CAN stop inflation and attain full employment. I pledge to do all that I can to achieve these goals.

THE NATION'S ECONOMY

Unemployment is up by more than 25 percent in the last year.

The cost of living rose by 7.6 percent in the same period.

The wholesale price index rose during January at an annual rate of 8.4 percent indicating inflation through 1970 if policies are not changed.

Congress effected a net reduction of $5.5 billion in the Administration budget for the current fiscal year.

The prime lending rate has risen to 8.5 percent.

Housing starts were down by 36 percent last year.

THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION FOR HIGHER EDUCATION

HON. J. GLENN BEALL, JR.

OF MARYLAND

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. BEALL of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, a major source of concern to some of us in this body has been the manner in which the resources of our colleges and universities were employed. For three decades the Federal Government has been employing the universities to do work which it wanted done. While most of these projects were undeniably in the national interest, the fact still remains that this tendency has worked to divert the academic community from pursuing excellence and reform in fields of its own choosing.

To correct this imbalance, President Nixon has proposed the creation of a National Foundation for Higher Education. Similar to the National Science Foundation; this new Foundation would provide a Federal source for institutions which wish to experiment. Besides acting as a source of funds, the Foundation would act as an organization at the highest level concerned with the development of national policy in higher education. The President has announced that he expects to request $200 million for this organization in fiscal year 1972. I am sure that the higher education community will welcome this long-needed source of support from the Federal Government.

EXCERPTS FROM "THE ENVIRONMENTAL HANDBOOK"

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, 1 month from yesterday will be Earth Day, the first of the environmental teach-ins to be observed across America.

Many of us in the Congress will be participating in the various activities planned for April 22. Recently, Ballantine Books published a valuable guidebook of research material dealing with environmental quality issues and perspectives. The book was edited by Garrett De Bell, and I commend him on his fine choice of articles.

After reading "The Environmental Handbook" I have picked out a number of the articles which I feel are extremely helpful and I plan to insert them into the RECORD over the next few days. Today, as an introduction, I am inserting three pieces on the meaning of ecology. The articles follow:

THE MEANING OF ECOLOGY

I. SMOKEY THE BEAR SUTRA

Once in the Jurassic, about 150 million years ago, the Great Sun Buddha in this corner of the Infinite Void gave a great Discourse to all the assembled elements and energies: to the standing beings, the walking beings, the flying beings, and the sitting beings—even grasses, to the number of thirteen billion, each one born from a seed, were assembled there: a Discourse concerning Enlightenment on the planet Earth.

"In some future time, there will be a continent called America. It will have great centers of power called such as Pyramid Lake, Walden Pond, Mt. Rainier, Big Sur, Everglades and so forth; and powerful rivers and channels such as Columbia River, Mississippi River, the Grand Canyon. The human race in that era will get into troubles all over its head, and practically wreck everything in spite of its own intelligent Buddha nature."

"The twisting strata of the great mountains and the pulsings of great volcanoes are my love burning deep in the earth. My obstinate compassion is schist and basalt and granite, to be mountains, to bring down the rain. In that future American Era I shall enter a new form: to cure the world of loveless knowledge that seeks with blind hunger; and mindless rage eating food that will not fill it."

And he showed himself in his true form of Smokey the Bear.

A handsome smokey-colored brown bear standing on his hind legs, showing that he is aroused and watchful.

Bearing in his right paw the Shovel that digs to the truth beneath appearances; cuts the roots of useless attachments, and flings damp sand on the fires of greed and war;

His left paw in the Mudra of Comradely Display—indicating that all creatures have the full right to live to their limits and that deer, rabbits, chipmunks, snakes, dandelions, and lizards all grow in the realm of the Dharma;

Wearing the blue work overalls symbolic of slaves and laborers, the countless men oppressed by civilization that claims to save but only destroys;

Wearing the broad-brimmed hat of the West, symbolic of the forces that guard the Wilderness, which is the Natural State of the Dharma and the True Path of man on earth; all true paths lead through mountains—

With a halo of smoke and flame behind, the forest fires of the kali-yuga, fires caused by the stupidity of those who think things can be gained and lost whereas in truth all is contained vast and free in the Blue Sky and Green Earth of One Mind;

Round-bellied to show his kind nature and that the great earth has food enough for everyone who loves and trusts her;

Trampling underfoot wasteful freeways and needless suburbs; smashing the worms of capitalism and totalitarianism;

Indicating the Task: his followers, becoming free of cars, houses, canned food, universities, and shoes, master the Three Mysteries of their own Body, Speech, and Mind; and fearlessly chop down the rotten trees and prune out the sick limbs of this country America and then burn the leftover trash.

Wrathful but Calm, Austere but Comic, Smokey the Bear will Illuminate those who would help him; but for those who would hinder or slander him, he will put them out.

Thus his great Mantra: Namah samanta vajranam chanda maharoshana Sphataya hum traka ham mam.

"I dedicate myself to the universal diamond be this raging fury destroyed."

And he will protect those who love woods and rivers, Gods and animals, hobos and madmen, prisoners and sick people, musicians, playful women, and hopeful children;

And if anyone is threatened by advertising, air pollution, or the police, they should chant "Smokey the Bear's Spell: Drown Their Butts, Crush Their Butts, Drown Their Butts, Crush Their Butts."

And Smokey the Bear will surely appear to put the enemy out with his vajra-shovel.

Now those who recite this Sutra and then try to put it in practice will accumulate merit as countless as the sands of Arizona and Nevada.

Will help save the planet Earth from total oil slick,

Will enter the age of harmony of man and nature,

Will win the tender love and caresses of men, women, and beasts

Will always have ripe blackberries to eat and a sunny spot under a pine tree to sit at,

And in the end will win highest perfect enlightenment. Thus have we heard.

II. FROM THE LIFE AND TIMES OF ARCHY AND MEHITABEL: DON MARQUIS

"dear boss i was talking with an ant the other day and he handed me a lot of gossip which ants the world around are chewing among themselves

"i pass it on to you in the hope that you may relay it to other human beings and hurt their feelings with it

"no insect likes human beings and if you think you can see why the only reason i tolerate you is because you seem less human to me than most of them

"here is what they are saying

"it wont be long now it wont be long man is making deserts on the earth it wont be long now before man will have used it up so that nothing but ants and centipedes and scorpions can find a living on it

"man has oppressed us for a million years but he goes on steadily cutting the ground from under his own feet making deserts deserts deserts

"we ants remember and have it all recorded in our tribal lore when gobi was a paradise swarming with men and rich in human prosperity it is a desert now and the home of scorpions ants and centipedes

"what man calls civilization always results in deserts man is never on the square he uses up the fat and greenery of the earth each generation wastes a little more of the future with greed and lust for riches.

"north africa was once a garden spot and then came carthage and rome and despoiled the storehouse and now you have sahara sahara ants and centipedes

"toltecs and aztecs had a mighty civilization on this continent but they robbed the soil and wasted nature and now you have deserts scorpions ants and centipedes and the deserts of the near east followed egypt and babylon and assyria and persia and rome and the turk the ant is the inheritor of tamerlane and the scorpion succeeds the caesars

"america was once a paradise of timberland and stream but it is dying because of the greed and money lust of a thousand little kings who slashed the timber all to hell and would not be controlled and changed the climate and stole the rainfall from posterity and it wont be long now it wont be long till everything is a desert from the alleghenies to the rockies the deserts are coming the deserts are spreading the springs and streams are drying up one day the mississippi itself will be a bed of sand ants and scorpions and centipedes shall inherit the earth

"men talk of money and industry of hard times and recoveries of finance and economics but the ants wait and the scorpions wait for while men talk they are making deserts all the time getting the world ready for the conquering ant drought and erosion and desert because men cannot learn

"rainfall passing off in flood and freshet and carrying good soil with it because there are no longer forests to withhold the water in the billion meticulations of the roots

"it wont be long now it wont be long till earth is barren as the moon and sapless as a mumbled bone

"dear boss I relay this information without any fear that humanity will take warning and reform signed archy."

III. THE ENVIRONMENTAL TEACH-IN: RENÉ DUBOS

The world is too much with us. We know this intuitively. But our social and economic institutions seem unable to come to grips with this awareness. The most they do is to appoint blue-ribbon committees and organize symposia which endlessly restate what everybody knows in a turgid prose that nobody reads and that leads to no action.

I do not believe that the environmental teach-in will provide new insight or factual knowledge, but I do hope that it will help alert public opinion to the immediacy of the ecologic crisis. The teach-in should point to action programs that can be developed now in each particular community. It should try also to define the areas of concern where knowledge is inadequate for effective action, but could be obtained by pointed research. I know that many scientists and technologists would welcome a form of public pressure that would provide them with the opportunity to work on problems of social importance.

The colossal inertia and rigidity—if not indifference—of social and academic institutions makes it unlikely that they will develop effective programs of action or research focused on environmental problems. Two kinds of events, however, may catalyze and accelerate the process. One is some ecological catastrophe that will alarm the public and thus bring pressure on the social, economic, and academic establishments. Another more attractive possibility is the emergence of a grassroots movement, powered by romantic emotion as much as by factual knowledge, that will give form and strength to the latent public concern with environmental quality. Because students are vigorous, informed, and still uncommitted to vested interests, they constitute one of the few groups in our society that can act as spearheads of this grassroots movement. I wish I were young enough to be a really effective participant in the Environmental Teach-In and to proclaim in action rather than in words my faith that GNP and technological efficiency are far less important than the quality of the organic world and the suitability of the environment for a truly human life.

VIETNAM

HON. JOHN H. DENT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, Mr. and Mrs. Luther Palmer, of Greensburg, Pa., two old and dear friends, have given me permission to share with you and our colleagues their memories of SP4 Larry Dale Palmer, a beloved grandson. Young Larry was a victim of the terrible destruction we call Vietnam.

I cannot add a thought, a sentiment, or a single word without feeling that I have intruded into a private valley of unselfish devotion, love of family, and respect of country.

My friend's letter to me, a poem written by Larry, and the young man's obituary follow:

GREENSBURG, PA.,
February 28, 1970.

DEAR FRIEND JOHN—Enclosed you will find a clipping with the picture of my grandson and another of a poem that he wrote in September of 1969 on the battlefield in Danang. These I want you to have in remembrance of us both. He loved to hunt and fish and these were the sports that he really enjoyed, but just for a short while as the Army inducted him and put him in the infantry to die on the battlefield near Danang.

He managed to get through it for about six long months and was finally killed September 20th—1970. He had a close call to death December 12th which hospitalized him for about one month and then sent back to the battlefront again for another close call from his own men and then another close one when by what I call a miracle as he was leading a group of five including himself as point man or as a leader when the Lieutenant who was behind him told him to fall to the rear and he would lead for a while. The Lieutenant continued on for about 10 steps and stepped on a booby trap which killed him and the man behind him, wounded the next man in the leg, cut the vertebrae out of the next man at the neck and he will be paralyzed for life from the neck down, and will only be able to move his head a bit. He is in a hospital in Japan. My Grandson who was fifth in line was knocked to the ground by the concussion of the blast. Action continues most every day and on another day he and another boy were sent to place some obstacles to interfere with the advance of the enemy when their own men cut loose on them and another close call to death as they took for cover and as the enemy was closing in, they started to fire at the two of them as they took cover in a rice field and crawled through the water on their stomachs headed for the American side but far enough off to one side where their own men couldn't see them and again they came through safe. The next encounter was Sept 19 when the Americans lost 4 men killed and 13 wounded, and the Vietnams lost 4 killed. Then came the fateful day of Feb. 20th when one unit was being cut down by enemy fire and a call came in for help and that is when my Grandson's group went to the rescue and that is when he was shot through the head and was killed.

All told 14 men were killed and 29 wounded. There was only two of his squad of 12 that was left and the other 10 was new replacements. I wrote a letter to the lone one and if I don't receive a reply from him, then I know that he was killed also. It will take at least 12 days to receive a reply from him providing he gets a chance to write if he is still alive. Then they are faced with the children and women situation. Those villages are supposed to be peaceful people but watch for hand grenades from children and women and also rifle fire from women.

They also furnish information to the enemy at night. Now they want to try our boys for murder and I plead with you Congressmen and Senators to never let these trials take place. I just read in the paper yesterday where they are holding 6 marines for the murder of 18 civilians. To me it seems we are fighting one of the most ruthless enemies in the world with spies all around our American soldiers who will kill you with the blink of an eye and we are supposed to fight and die against them with kid gloves.

If dropping a couple of Hydrogen bombs or missiles on them would stop this affair I would be willing to do the dropping if our generals are afraid. I think it would stop this terrible slaughter of our boys just like it did in Japan and we didn't do it soon enough then. If we would have done it sooner, I know thousands of our boys from World War two would still be living. We have two more days before he will be laid to rest but memories will linger on for the rest of his parents and friends lives. Let's hope that God soon brings Peace on Earth Good Will toward Men for every day in the year.

With Love

Mr. and Mrs. LUTHER PALMER.

NEAR DANANG—COUNTY MAN IS KILLED IN ACTION IN VIETNAM

A Greensburg area soldier has been killed in action in Vietnam.

SP4 Larry Dale (Duke) Palmer of Greensburg RD 2, serving with the 196th Light Infantry Brigade near Tam Ky, south of DaNang, was killed Friday, Feb. 20, in an engagement with a hostile force.

A son of Luther Dale and Margaret Altman Palmer, he was drafted in April, 1969, and completed his basic training at Fort Jackson, S.C. and additional training in the infantry at the same post. He went to Vietnam in September, 1969.

He was a graduate of Hempfield Area High School, class of 1967, and was a member of the First United Church of Christ, Greensburg.

Besides his parents, he is survived by a sister, Linda Marie Rega, his paternal grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. Luther Palmer and his maternal grandmother, Mrs. Laird Altman and a niece Cheri Rega, all of Greensburg RD 2.

Funeral arrangements will be announced later by the Maurice C. Barnhart Funeral Home, Greensburg.

IN MEMORIAM

A THOUGHT

Written October 1969 during actual wartime combat in Viet Nam by SP-4 Larry Palmer who since was killed in action February 20, 1970.

It was October the 12th in the year 69.
And the American people were all well and fine.
But for thousands of GI's in South Viet Nam,
Even the weather was not to be calm.
For it was the monsoon season with mud, rain and wind,
And it seemed God was angered at this world that had sinned.
For war was the thing that had spread through the land,
From the steaming hot jungles to far distant sands.
And at night in my tent I would sit and would pray,
That God would grant life for just one more day.
For we were the heros who would set these people free,
But the whole idea seemed kind of funny to me.
To stop Communist aggression, that was our goal,
But the price we were paying was a terrible toll.
For forty thousand soldiers had come here and died,
And now they were home in the ground side by side,
Three hundred sixty-five days, that was my tour,
To live or to die in this terrible war.
And as I sit and write with my pen in hand,
I pray for world peace throughout the whole land.

CATFISH FARMING, A NEW LIVESTOCK

HON. J. J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, asking the indulgence of my more urbane colleagues from the megalopolis areas of the North and East, I would take this opportunity to spread before you the moneymaking opportunities hatched from the lowly catfish.

The catfish, long one of the most maligned members of the piscatorial set, has lately found prominence in the culinary environs. It is true, this same fat old channel catfish that for centuries has appeased the more rustic of appetites has suddenly become a delicacy among the city-slickers.

I am painfully aware that the mere mention of "catfish farming" starts a malicious grin on the face of our more cosmopolitan members. However, that smile takes on a serious bent once they learn that the agrarians in their district can earn anywhere from $250 to $750 per water-covered acre with the proper tutorial assistance.

Please pardon the fun, Mr. Speaker, but I have just participated in one of the most pleasant projects that I ever held in my district. Last month, with the capable assistance of the Texas A. & M. Extensive Service and the USDA Soil Conservation Service, I sponsored a catfish farming seminar in the 10th Congressional District of Texas.

The response was overwhelming. Nearly 300 people from all over Texas appeared and stayed for a day-long seminar examining the profits and the pitfalls of this new agribusiness—catfish farming.

At the outset, I would emphasize that this is a high-risk venture. Lots of people go broke—but many, many more find this idea of catfish farming is profitable and fun if they just follow the simple rules of good management and custodial treatment.

For example, the agriculture experts at Texas A. & M. Extension Service are ready to take the wraps off the plans to increase the income from Texas farm products $1 billion within just a few years: their goal in billions of dollars is "3.76 in 1976."

To do this, they are counting heavily on the growth of catfish farming. If the A. & M. predictions ring true, catfish farming in Texas will reach the present income levels of our long-established and profitable poultry business by 1976, or much sooner. This represents well over 100 million new dollars.

Let me immediately dispel any theorists who might tag me as an authority. I am no expert on catfish farming. However, I can appreciate those who would break new ground. To do this, let me introduce into the RECORD the remarks of a distinguished and knowledgeable man in this field, Mr. Olan Dillon, the regional biologist for the Fort Worth office of the Soil Conservation Service. I include his remarks summarizing the fish farming outlook:

SUMMARY OF COMMERCIAL FISH FARMING IN THE UNITED STATES

(By Olan W. Dillon, Jr., regional biologist, Soil Conservation Service, Fort Worth, Tex.)

Producing fish in agricultural water is America's newest livestock industry. While many agricultural products are faced with surpluses, crop allotment systems, and price regulations, fish is a crop whose production knows no surplus, no acreage controls, and no price regulations and commands a good market image and a sale price. Fish farming, especially for warm water fish, serves conservation purposes by retaining water in farming areas, helps to control erosion, and uses land often too wet for field crops.

Fish farming in the United States is carried on with more kinds of fish that most people realize. Some of these are bait minnows, buffalo-fish, carp, catfish, trout, bass, bluegills, and crayfish. Studies are underway to adapt to pond culture, estuarine, and salt water species including shrimp, oysters, mussels, pompano, and others. The largest poundage of fish produced, however, is in channel catfish, bait minnows and trout.

Interest in fish farming is so widespread and intense that obtaining reliable estimates of the acreage of ponds and the pounds of fish produced by fish farmers is difficult. We found such a wide variance in both acreage and pounds that we decided to make a survey through the field offices of the Soil Conservation Service. The Soil Conservation Service assists over 3,000 soil conservation districts and maintains a staff of professional technicians in virtually every county in the Nation. Technical assistance in soils, engineering ,and biology is provided to fish farmers the same as for other agricultural enterprises. Because SCS is working in this field we can find out about the fish farming activities in a county although we may not be working with every fish farmer. The figures given in this paper are the result of this survey.

Channel catfish, the former stripling of the fish farming industry, has become the giant. Methods presently being used to grow channel catfish were virtually unknown in 1960. In April 1969, land owners and operators planned to have more than 32,000 acres (30,000 in the South) in food fish production and will produce close to 40 million pounds this year. Another 3,000 acres or so are in channel catfish fingerling production.

To show how rapidly catfish farming is growing, Dr. Fred Meyer* estimated that approximately 24,000 acres were producing food-size fish and another 1,600 acres were producing fingerlings. Our April 1969 estimate showed that food fish production is up 33 percent over 1968. Since the survey was made we know of several hundred acres of new water being used and some conversion from minnows to catfish. One company, recently organized, has put in 300 acres of ponds this year and plans to have 1,000 acres by fall.

A second company plans to have at least 1,600 acres of water in production by next year. We also know of several ponds that have been converted to catfish from minnows. These new and converted waters have not been included in our summary. We know that fish farming in the South is growing more rapidly than one can keep up with it. Catfish farming is also growing in other states such as Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, and California. Results of our survey of the major catfish producing states are listed in table 1.

A new development is the production of channel catfish in raceways. Tennessee has close to 13,000 feet of raceways this year and Georgia has about 10,000 feet. Production to date has been about 2,000 pounds of fish in each 100 feet of raceways. There are indications that production may go as high as 3,000 pounds per 100 feet as operators gain more experience in this technique. This method of culture depends on high volumes of water to be practical.

A lot of research is being carried on at the present time to grow channel catfish in baskets. Some Georgia farmers see enough future in this method of culture that they have close to 200,000 catfish on feed in baskets at this time. This method makes possible the use of water areas such as gravel pits, large lakes, floodwater-retarding structures, farm ponds, or other bodies of water where harvesting fish is difficult or impossible.

Catfish fingerling production has almost doubled in one year. Meyer (ibid) estimated 1,600 acres in 1968. Our estimate for 1969 is 3,000 acres. Three thousand acres of water in fingerling production may well produce 100 million fingerling catfish. How many fingerlings will be produced will not be known until this fall. In fact more acreage may be put in fingerling production because at the time this paper was written the spawning season was just getting into full swing. The fingerlings produced in 1969 will be the fish stocked in the spring of 1970 to produce food fish in the fall and winter of 1970. Data given in this paper do not include production by state or federal hatcheries.

What about markets for the 40 million pounds of channel catfish now being produced? So far all the fish produced have moved into such markets as fish-out ponds, onfarm sales, local sales, processing plants, and franchise and other restaurants. Mr. Walter Jones on this program will more adequately cover the marketing aspects of this subject.

Minnow culture began in the United States in the early 1900's. It now ranks number two in acreage of water devoted to fish farming. It is losing ground; Meyer (ibid) estimated the 1968 production as just under 24,000 acres whereas our survey showed a little more than 20,000 acres in minnow production.

Arkansas has the largest acreage in minnows. They grow mostly golden shiners, although other kinds are grown. Production usually averages 500 pounds or more per acre; thus more than 10 million pounds of minnows will be produced this year. These fish farmers run a large and efficient business. They can compete favorably in price and quality anywhere in the United States because they apply modern techniques of growing, handling, harvesting and hauling fish.

A new development in minnow farming is the stocking of 100 or so channel catfish in minnow ponds. The catfish grow well and have little effect on the pounds of minnows produced.

Trout farming began in the United States "in" or "about" 1853 and has had a long and colorful history. Fish farmers will grow around 13 million pounds of trout this year. Again I remind you that this figure indicates the number of fish being produced by private enterprise and does not include fish produced by state or federal agencies.

Idaho leads in pounds of trout produced because it has high volume springs of cold water. It will grow more than 4 million pounds this year. The South, which is not usually considered a trout-producting area, will produce close to 3 million pounds. Cold water springs with constant temperatures suitable for trout production are in Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. The balance of trout production comes from the northern and western states.

Fish-out ponds are important markets for trout, especially in the South. Another paper on this program covers the way that many private land owners and operators develop their cold water resources. How the trout farming business expands, however, is based on the availability of cold water springs, improved efficiency of operation, new techniques, and market promotions.

Another agricultural product of particular interest since we are meeting here in New Orleans, is the crawfish industry. Louisiana produces 3 million pounds of this gourmet food on 6,000 acres of farmland. This is in addition to a sizeable industry that takes crawfish from the bayous, swamps and other natural waters.

In the time allotted, we will not try to cover all business generated by fish farmers, such as heavy equipment, nets, chemicals, etc., but we will mention the feed business.

Channel catfish are the leading consumers of feed. Using my estimate of 32,000 acres in channel catfish and a production of 1200 pounds per acre, 38 million pounds of fish would be produced. Using a realistic feed conversion ratio of 2.0 pounds of feed for each pound of flesh, catfish consume 72 million pounds of feed or 36,000 tons. At the current price of $100 per ton, feed sales then would amount to 3.6 million. Again, no public (state or federal) agency feed requirements are included in this figure.

Trout are next in feed consumption. Again, assuming 2.0 feed conversion, easily obtainable by a good fish farmer, the thirteen million pounds produced this year consume 13,000 tons of feed. At $200 per ton, trout farming uses more than 2.5 million dollars worth of feed.

Minnows are fed on a much less intensive scale than catfish or trout. Meyer (ibid) states that many farmers use a fertilization program to encourage natural food and provide manufactured feed as a supplement. Feed costs range from $25.00 to $250.00 per acre per year, with most farmers in the lower range. Dr. Meyer estimated that if 7 pounds of feed per acre per day were used for a 210-day growing season, feed consumption for 24,000 acres would be 16,800 tons. At a price of $95.00 per ton, minnow feed sales totaled 1.6 million dollars in 1968.

Although there has been a cutback in minnow farms in 1969, there is still a good demand for bait for recreation fishing.

Many problems remain to be solved especially with catfish. Oxygen depletion continues to plague producers as do parasites and diseases. Badly needed chemicals must be cleared with the Food and Drug Administration either by the manufacturer or by a public agency so that fish farmers can have the disease control tools they need. Research in feeds and feeding methods already underway need to be expanded. There is a lot to be learned about basket culture, raceway production of channel catfish, practical methods of using air to prevent oxygen shortages, and many other things.

The fish farmer associations in both trout and catfish have a tremendous job ahead in consumer education, market promotion and keeping a steady 12-month supply of fish. Processors must develop a wide variety of products that attract both wholesale and retail outlets.

The fish farming industry has made tremendous strides in the past few years. I am confident that it will solve the many problems ahead.

*Meyer, Fred P. 1968. Commercial fish production in the U.S. and its relation to the feed industry. Animal Nutrition Research Council, Washington, D.C., October 17, 1968.

Mr. Speaker, there is much more to be said about the new potential offered by catfish farming. To paraphrase an angry constituent who once wrote a poignant letter to Sam Houston, "You'll hear more from me when I am ready."

ORT—ORGANIZATION FOR REHABILITATION THROUGH TRAINING

HON. JACOB H. GILBERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, March 18 was designated as ORT Day throughout the United States. I want to take this occasion to extend my hearty good wishes to ORT, and to call to the attention of my colleagues in Congress the important and valuable work of this outstanding organization.

ORT—Organization for Rehabilitation Through Training—is a program for rebuilding lives through vocational education. The recognized vocational training agency for the Jewish people, ORT's central creed is that man is best aided by being helped to become independent, self-supporting, and self-respecting.

ORT is the world's largest nongovernmental vocational training agency. Its students include the poverty-stricken inhabitants of underdeveloped countries, refugees and immigrants seeking a new life, and youngsters trying to build secure futures.

ORT operates in 22 countries on five continents. In 1968, ORT students enrolled in over 650 training units. In Europe, some 10,063; in Israel, 30,060; in North Africa, 2,287; in Iran, 2,991. Other ORT schools are in New York. South America, South Africa, and India. The number of ORT students has doubled in the past 5 years, and ORT has been working unceasingly to grow still further to admit the steadily increasing number of applicants. In 1969/70, ORT will enroll nearly 55,000 students.

ORT must meet tremendous pressures in France, where a torrential immigration—the largest Jewish population shift since World War II—has posed grave problems for the new refugees. Israel, too, has great and increasing need for ORT-trained workers.

The standard ORT school is a vocational high school, with a three-to-four year curriculum in which an academic high school education is given along with technical training in the most advanced industrial trades. ORT also conducts special programs for those lacking the time or the requisite prior education to attend a four-year day school. These programs include apprenticeship and pre-apprenticeship courses, refresher and adaptation courses, course teaching rudimentary skills that will enable the student to get a beginning industrial job, and courses to increase the skills and income of those already employed in a trade.

ORT gives training in more than 70 modern industrial skills. The trades taught vary according to the needs of the particular area's economy. Thus, ORT students get the greatest opportunity for employment.

ORT helps to build underdeveloped economies and to man the industries of free countries striving to keep pace with technological advances. Acknowledging this help, the U.N. and some two dozen countries (including the U.S.), most of which have ORT schools within their borders, have given ORT sizeable and repeated grants.

Women's American ORT, the American women's branch of the World ORT Union, is the largest World ORT Union affiliate, and the second largest single source of financial support to ORT. It now has 87,000 members in 700 chapters located in all major American cities.

The ORT program is financed by the World ORT Union and affiliates; by the Joint Distribution Committee, a member agency of the United Jewish Appeal, and by governments, foundations, et cetera, throughout the world, Women's American ORT supports the program through its membership dues.

"IS IT TOO LATE FOR ALL OF US?" LOS ANGELES ENGLISH CLASS ASKS ABOUT SMOG

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I believe in—and always have listened to—young people. And I have learned many things from them.

Lately, my mail has been heavy from young Americans concerned with environmental quality. The message invariably is the same: "if pollution isn't cleaned up, then our generation may not survive; and it is your generation which is doing this to us; what are you going to do about it?"

The burden is on Congress to act now—and act decisively to halt pollution. Halfway measures are not enough; neither is procrastination or indecision. Already in the 91st Congress I have introduced a half dozen legislative proposals aiming to eliminate smog; in the near future I expect to submit even stronger bills to stop smog.

Today I would like to insert a series of letters from a 10th grade English class at John Marshall High School in Los Angeles. The class, taught by Mrs. D. Roth, has been studying air and water pollution problems, and they recently wrote me an extremely interesting series of letters.

As it soon becomes apparent, these students want to help overcome smog. They are looking for direction from us. We must respond. There is no alternative.

The letters follow:

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH,
February 5, 1970.

Congressman BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Since we live in a terribly polluted area, well known as the "gas chamber" and the "bay of smokes", I feel that more appropriate actions be taken against offenders of the air we breathe and the moral code of "live and let live."

If air pollution is further allowed to continue in Los Angeles, this city will truly be the "city of angels."

Our class has participated in investigating the problem of air and water pollution. We have learned of the history of pollution. Many of the facts we have uncovered, startled me and my classmates. The horrible and nauseating history of air pollution has made us aware of the destroying power it contains.

Also, the oil platform now being erected in San Pedro is another threat to our beaches and wildlife. Ins't the lesson taught at Santa Barbara, enough to make the oil companies, stop?

Because of the information we have learned, how can we make people more aware of the problem? How can I help, personally? Is it too late for all of us?

Yours truly,

JOHN LEW.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 7, 1970.

Congressman GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROWN: Recently, the English class in which I am a participant, conducted oral reports on pollution in air and water. Since that time, my classmates and I have become very aware and worried about this growing and overwhelming problem in our country.

It is our understanding that you are also concerned with this problem, and we would appreciate suggestions from you on ways for us, as individuals, to contribute to the elimination of this problem in the United States and world.

Your reply would be readily appreciated.

Yours very truly,

JOHN ROSSI.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1970.

Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Why should the people of today let themselves be killed off by air pollution? As a concerned student interested in the future of the world in all aspects, I, along with many other interested students, agree with your stand on air pollution, a topic which may mean the life or death of the people of the world. Automobiles and factories, the major contributors of air pollution, are slowly killing us off. More and better restrictions should be placed before it's too late. What can we, as interested students, do to help you in your campaign against air pollution?

Yours very truly,

RAYMOND KWONEY.

MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 6, 1970.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: As a student residing in Los Angeles, I regard pollution of the air and water as a serious threat to man's survival. I am writing to you both as an individual and as a member of a class since you seem to be one of few people in California seriously interested in rectifying this devastating situation. The further continuation of pollution is slowly ruining our ecology and environment, but attempts to complain on our level seem to go in vain. I hope that my added support to your programs will help bring about a solution.

Very truly yours,

MATT BLOOMFIELD.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 4, 1970.
Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Statistics show that in about ten years all life on the planet earth will perish from lack of clean air and water. How does it feel to know that your grandchildren may never live to remember you? I do not take kindly to the idea of knowing my children may not live to be four years old. Is the manufacturing of automobiles so very necessary that it may completely destroy the population of our planet? What good will a 450 cubic inch, V–8, super-charged engine, filled with F–310 do for a corpse. I, along with my classmates implore you to propose stricter legislation against car emissions plus factory wastes and all other major forms of pollution, including all the hot air rising out of the Congress building.

Chokingly (cough! cough!) yours,

GARY KARAPETIAN.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1970.
Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROWN: It seems to me that you are a sensible man. You would not inflict an injury upon yourself or let any other harm come to you, that is, if you can help it. But one problem concerns me: the problem of pollution. Pollution is the real killer. It creeps up slowly, and perhaps invisibly at first, and destroys living beings.

The reason I am writing you this letter is to ask you for some help. The students of my English class and myself are concerned with the ever increasing problem of pollution. Our class as a whole is not very influential in politics and other matters and is not yet powerful enough to attempt to cope with this problem. That is why I am writing to you. If you have any suggestions, or would like to help us personally, then I would be very grateful for your time and effort. Please contact me if you are interested.

Cordially yours,

YOURY KORINEC.

P.S.—You may contact or write me through John Marshall High School.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 6, 1970.
Congressman GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Our tenth grade English class here at John Marshall High School has recently been discussing problems we now face and we are deeply concerned over the rise of air pollution. After much discussion on the subject, your name was mentioned as a prominent citizen and politician fighting against the air pollution. There are many people who are against this problem but not many people are willing to do anything about it. I think it was very nice of you for sending around the survey post cards speaking out against the air pollution and many other problems.

My views on this subject is that we need tighter laws on the smog producing cars and jets. Even though the gasoline cars are going to be banned by 1975, we may not be able to live that long. Cars and jets, I feel, are mostly responsible for the air pollution in our skies. Another contributor to air pollution are the factories. The factories should be forced to find a way to filter out the black smoke and harmful chemicals before it enters the air. From our discussion, I feel these are the most important points we have discussed.

I hope you can send to me your views on the subject and give me some suggestions on how my classmates and I can help to rid this problem. Maybe you and your fellow Congressman can work together to get rid of this awful menace.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM QUAN.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 4, 1970.
Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MISTER BROWN: The letter I now write to you concerns smog. I am quite tired of seeing dirty air. Of the many letters written to you on smog, mine will be different. I offer no solutions of the far-fetched nature, a huge fan to blow the smog away, or the junking of all our cars. A fan would not work as the smog would eventually come back. As bad as cars are, it beats walking. The only forseeable solution I can offer you, would be to put heavy pressure on the auto industry. Quite possibly this would have no effect, as the conglomerate auto industry has become too powerful. As I have no voice except that of a worried student, I depend on you and the other government officials for my future. Being that you are running for office, what you say on the behalf of the people may only be to enhance you with the public. I quite literally am placing my future well-being in your hands and those of the elected government officials.

Yours very truly,

MICHAEL CHEN.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
Mr. GEORGE E. BROWN,
House of Representatives,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Through a recent inundation of reports in my English Class I have become concerned about pollution in the United States. I have done a little bit of research on the subject and have been appalled at what I have found. Something must be done! I'm sick and tired of hearing a lot of double-talk on why solutions are not practical or too expensive. After all is anything too expensive for our lives? Solutions must be found.

Everyone is apathetic when it comes to work but they sure do complain. . . . I would like to know what you and Congress are doing to solve this dilemma. Also, I would like to know what I can personally do, if even in a small way, to combat pollution. I'm sick and tired of breathing polluted air, drinking polluted water, and eating food with DDT on it.

Yours very truly,

GARY R. EDWARDS.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1970.
Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: I'm a student from John Marshall High School and I have done some research on air and water pollution for an English assignment. As you probably know the world population is increasing year by year. If the rising population rate continues the world population will rise from an estimated three point six billion to at least four point three billion, ten years from now. The United States now has two hundred and four million people which is a fourteen per cent growth rate during the past decade. By 1980 the Census Bureau estimates that the United States will have at least two hundred and twenty-five million people and perhaps two hundred and fifty million. How will the earth feed its rising population when it is being polluted?

Many people think that the vast bodies of water covering three fourths of the earth will help feed the future population. This will be very hard to do especially since the water is being polluted.

Our coast was the scene of the Union Oil Company oil leak last January. Oil spills in coastal waters add up to two hundred and eighty-four million gallons of spilled oil every year. That is enough to coat a beach twenty feet wide with a half inch layer of oil for eight thousand, six hundred and thirty-three miles. Also the pollution of lakes, streams and rivers should be eliminated unless we would like to see them as future quagmires and marshlands. These quagmires and marshlands would be possible prey for lodging harmful infections and such that might be harmful to animals and plants.

In such cases as sewage, there are tertiary plants which could be built.

The air is being filled with more than eight hundred million tons of pollutants per year. You, yourself, must be aware of how polluted the air is in California. If not, take a drive some morning up to Bee Rock, Griffith Park above Los Feliz Blvd. in Los Angeles. You should plan to arrive there at about sun rise to see the ugly reddish-brown cloud hanging above and in Los Angeles. To get an even better view of our polluted air as you are driving up into Angeles National Forest look down upon the cities. You have to be an extremely lucky person with good vision to see the cities through the smog.

My English class was given an assignment to choose a problem of the past decade. As you can tell, I chose pollution and so did practically half of the class because they felt that it was important. My class' assignment is to do or try to do something about pollution. We would like to know if there is any way that thirty-six students can help in trying to achieve our goal?

Sincerely,

JACQUOT HOYT.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1970.
Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Each day our lives are being shortened to the extent that people today will die years ahead of their otherwise lengthy life spans. Smog, oil, trash, and other pollutants contribute to the termination of all earth life. These relatively basic facts are but a few among the many uncovered by our tenth grade English class. Through research and reports recently done, we have become alarmingly aware of the horrifying predicament which we now face: Extermination by pollution! In order to prevent this immediate problem stricter anti-pollution laws must be established and enforced now. This we believe you can do. However we want more:

(1) We want to know what we can do both as a group and also as individuals. We are willing to work for the preservation of all habitation on the surface of the earth . . . specifically, our own!

(2) We also want to know just exactly what you are now doing about this as well as whatever plans you have made for action in the near future.

Please inform us of the above. We shall be awaiting your reply, as any and all help you can render will be much appreciated.

Most Sincerely,

VICKI BOLLER.

Los Angeles, Calif.
Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am a student of John Marshall High School. I have just completed a report on pollution for my English class. I was horrified! The three and a half million gallons of crude petroleum in the Santa Barbara Channel, the smog we breath everyday, and the fear of another ice age has moved me to action. I am writing to protest the wastes we pour into our environment. If we do not try to clean our land we will die by 1980! I know you can not wave your hand and all pollution will be gone, but you are my representative in Congress, the one who can introduce legislation on stopping pollution. I know of your interest from the questionaires you have sent out. I want you to know of my concern for this world, this country, and my children.

Yours truly,

BEVERLY QUON.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 6, 1970.

Congressman GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Among the many letters that you receive each day how many are concerned with the problem of air pollution? With continuous warnings and predictions that pollution will be the death of us all, pressure to stop air pollution must surely be great.

I am a student at John Marshall High School and this too is a letter concerning the present condition of our precious air.

A few years ago there were many popular jokes about Los Angeles' smog. A comedian could always get an assured laugh by telling one. Today no one would think of joking about such a serious matter. For the future tomorrows, there may be nothing left to think about or nothing left even to think. It is hoped that you are not still laughing.

This is not meant to be an insulting letter condemning you but a plea, an inquiry, a complaint even a suggestion to act now in this serious situation. The future looks very depressing and discouraging when people do not care enough to save their environment, their lives, children and future. You have been given the authority to do what I as one individual cannot. I urge you to use this power and help.

Mr. Brown, What I am asking is, what can and will you do anything about the present problem of air pollution?

Sincerely,

PAMELA WONG.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1070.

Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am a high school student at John Marshall High. Our tenth grade class did individual reports on important problems that are affecting us and have been affecting us in the past decade. These reports were done orally. The majority of the students did their reports on air and water pollution. They gave interesting and accurate statistics.

I have come to believe that the people who can do something about this problem are going to wait until it becomes so bad that it will be impossible to improve it. The reason for this that they don't want to spend too much money. An example of this is the new gasoline called F310, produced by the Chevron Company. It is said that it reduces the black smoke in the air and therefore makes the air cleaner. It has been brought to the attention of our class that this "improved" gasoline is not purified but merely has the addition of detergents. It is said that this addition produces chemicals that are more poisonous to us even though they can't be seen.

It is obvious that something must be done about the problem. It must be a drastic improvement despite the cost.

I am very interested and concerned with the problem and will be happy to do what I can to improve it, though, as only one person, it would probably be very little. However, I would rather do all I can than just sit around and talk about it.

Yours truly,

PAULA HARVEY.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.,
February 5, 1970.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am writing to you because I have heard that you are concerned with the current problem of pollution.

I am a high school student and recently my English class did reports on pollution and other disconcerting issues.

The statistics I heard on the problem of pollution were literally terrifying. Such statements as "pollution is killing hundreds of people each year, and "pollution is making our waterways uninhabitable", and "pollution will eventually destroy mankind" really impressed me. These warnings are but a few among many and I am gravely concerned about this disasterous problem.

Please send me data showing what is being done to curtail pollution and include, if you will, suggestions as to what I can do to help stop pollution. I may be but a "drop of water in a bucket," but I feel that "every little drop counts".

I shall be most appreciative of a reply from you concerning this important matter.

Yours truly,

DEXTER WILLIAMS.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 7, 1970.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am one hundred percent behind you in your fight against environmental pollution. If more of the people in office were as concerned as you are about pollution perhaps we could win the battle against it. Many concerned citizens may be reluctant in believing that you are sincere in your fight against pollution because this is an election year and many politicians have used similar campaign tactics. If you could send me information on what you are doing to combat pollution I believe that I could honestly campaign for you in the upcoming election.

I particularly am concerned about air pollution and would like to know what I can do to help fight it. I feel that clean air is man's most urgent demand on his environment. He can go without food for weeks and without water for days, but he can only hold his breath for a minute or two, then he must breathe even if it kills him, as it sometimes does.

I think that sending out questionnaires was an excellent idea because it finally gives people a chance to voice their opinions on pollution. Once again, I would like to thank you for your efforts in combating pollution.

Yours Very Truly,

RICHARD MANDL.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 7, 1970.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: As a student of John Marshall High School, my tenth grade English class has done several series of reports. Concerning the gerat many problems of the sixties, and some which are still affecting United States now. A great many people wrote on Air Pollution. Soon our air, will be impossible to breath. I feel that by cracking down on General Motors, and the other car manufacturers, we could clean, or at least cut down on Pollution in our Air. The automobile is the main reason for air pollution. So if there were some campaign, I would be for this a great deal. I am behind your campaign one hundred percent. Would it be at all possible to let me have more information on your Anti-Smog Campaign . . . Thank You.

Yours Very Truly,

DENISE ORTEGO.

JOHN MARSHALL HIGH SCHOOL,
Los Angeles, Calif., February 5, 1970.

Mr. GEORGE BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Recently, in our English class at John Marshall High School, we did a series of reports concerning the problems that faced the sixties. (And in some cases, the problems that are still facing us.) An abundant amount of reports were centered on air pollution. I have become alarmed after hearing what has happened and what is happening to our air. It seems as though it is impossible (or almost impossible) to help curb this problem by cracking down on General Motors. I am sure that they are "quite" aware of what is happening; and that they are already working on a solution. But yet, the automobile is the main source of pollution in our air. What other means of attack is there? Even though in some cases it seems impossible, I would like to say that I am behind your "anti-pollution" movement 100%. Because of my interest, I would like to request that you inform me if there is anything I can do to help with this campaign against pollution. Thank you very much.

Yours Very Truly,

SUZANNE RAIMOND.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.,
February 5, 1970.

GEORGE E. BROWN,
House of Representatives,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROWN: I have received one of your survey cards on pollution. Therefore, I am under the impression that you would like to do something about pollution. This prompted some of my classmates and me to write to you, requesting that you and your fellow congressmen, if at all possible, do something about solving the pollution problem. So far we have heard a lot of talk, but have seen very few results. May I remind you that your lives are also in danger of pollution.

Our food crops are being destroyed by smog, every year people die of smog, our waterways are unsafe for recreation, or consumption, animals are dying by the thousands, and American women have twice as much D.D.T. in their breast milk as is allowed in the shipment of cow's milk for human consumption.

There is no need for this sir! So in behalf of the world, we urge you and your colleagues in Washington to take some feasible action against pollution.

I would like to have some information concerning what the government is doing to fight pollution, and what I can do to help.

Yours truly,

DONALD LA FONTAINE.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.,
February 5, 1970.

Hon. GEORGE BROWN,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BROWN: Pollution is gradually killing every one of the people on this earth. It has already been shown that smog aids in the cause of respiratory diseases and decreases the normal life expectancy. Pollution of our waterways destroys the wildlife that is so vital to our existence. Many people have talked of stopping pollution, but little significant action has been taken.

Laws should be more specific in governing the disposal methods of the large factories and plants that produce so much waste. The laws should be pulled tight around the necks of car manufacturers, forcing them to replace the internal combustion engine that pollutes our air with a more sensible and safer engine, such as the steam turbine or electric engine. The offshore drilling companies should be made to stop their drilling completely. The new super-jets, in which one engine produces pollutants equal to those of 100 cars, should be rigidly restricted.

My classmates and I have done rather extensive research on pollution in general and on specific problems of pollution. We believe that something should be done now because tomorrow may be too late.

Very truly yours.

MARTHA REDEKER.

Mr. BROWN,
Federal Office Building,
Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BROWN: In the 50,000 years that we homo sapiens have inhabited this earth, we have manged to contribute more to the ultimate end of life than all other organisms in the previous 1.6 billion combined. Our continuous interference with nature's balance has placed us in a position where unless we take fast, radical steps, all life will have ceased to exist by the end of the decade. Recently, as the result of an English assignment, I became aware and extremely concerned with my fate and that of future generations. Personally, I would like to see the arrival of the next century. Wouldn't you?

As a government official, I'm sure that you could provide me with the following information:

(1) What the nation is doing about this problem of survival.

(2) What you, as a representative of the people, are doing or trying to do to prevent us from extinction.

(3) What my classmates and I can do to help.

Be specific, please. (Names of organizations and people that could use our help, as well as people to whom we could protest.)

Response would be much appreciated. I believe that it is time for action; enough has been said. After all, we DON'T have all the time in the world.

Yours truly,

GISELA DIAZ.

Mr. BROWN,

DEAR MR. BROWN: Recently our English class decided to do current event reports about problems that affected our lives and the lives of the coming generations.

We were confronted with many problems, among then was the increasingly alarming problem of the pollution of air, water, and land.

I learned many startling facts about pollution and became frightened at the aspect of a dense fog of smelly harmful chemicals in the air (eight million tons per year), of not being able to swim in the rivers, streams, lakes and oceans that I have previously swum in (since pollutants will obviously destroy any possibility of this), of not being able to walk down the street (let alone going anywhere by foot) because of the muck on the ground.

I would like to make more people aware of the problem facing them and also be able to make them want to do something also and perhaps we will rid ourselves of the problem of pollution.

Yours truly,

JUDY MCCEOSKY.

Mr. BROWN,

DEAR MR. BROWN: I am a member of the 10th grade English class of John Marshall High School. Recently we were assigned to write a report of a problem we now face. The majority of the class reported on pollution. It was pointed out that all living matter of the earth will soon die within 10 years of pollution. In order to prevent this, we must act now! The headlines of today show that Congress is now bringing the problem up, yet no action has taken place.

Many solutions were presented to the problem and the solution that I felt was very effective was to set new laws to regulate combustion in the automobiles and in our growing industries.

With these measures taken, we will be able to rapidly decrease the invisibility that we now experience and smog alert will become extinct.

Please consider these solutions at your next session at Congress.

Yours truly,

ROSANNE MAEHARA.

A WELL-DESERVED TRIBUTE TO CONGRESSMAN LENNON

HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, I was pleased recently to take part in recognizing the outstanding service rendered to the Congress and the Nation by our respected colleague, ALTON LENNON, of North Carolina.

On February 24, 1970, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. LENNON) was presented the first "Oceanography Man of the Year" award by the National Oceanography Association, a citizens' group with members from industry, science, education, and interested public.

On that occasion, it was a privilege for me to say a few words about the marvelous work AL LENNON has done as chairman of the Subcommittee on Oceanography of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. As chairman of that committee, I have worked closely with him, and have had the opportunity to see him at close range and know how he conducts himself. AL LENNON has tackled that assignment, as he does all his assignments in the Congress, with deep dedication, industriousness, and vision. He is as dedicated to the future of marine affairs in the United States as he has been to the constituents whom he has served without fault during his many years in Congress.

The hearings recently conducted by the Oceanography Subcommittee have developed a rich source of information and provided a stimulus for national action. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee has labored hard over the past 10 years to bring the oceanographic needs of this Nation to public attention, and to create a needed national focus in marine affairs.

I commend the association for recognizing the work of our colleague. I was happy to have had the opportunity to take part in the award ceremony along with the Honorable CHARLES A. MOSHER, of Ohio, the distinguished minority leader of the subcommittee; and the Honorable CLAIBORNE PELL, Senator from Rhode Island, whose interest in oceanography is well known.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that years from now, when our knowledge and reliance upon the oceans will be far advanced, and we are well into our last great frontier, we will be able to look back upon, and appreciate the efforts of ALTON LENNON and the members of his subcommittee with true understanding and appreciation. The significance of his contributions will become clearer as time advances. And yet, he has managed this great contribution without once overlooking the needs of the citizens of his district, whom he has represented so scrupulously over these many years. The residents of the Seventh District of North Carolina can take great pride that they are represented by one of the most able and conscientious men in the Congress today.

The plaque presented to AL LENNON by the National Oceanography Association by the association president, Dr. Thomas Barrow of Houston, read as follows:

The National Oceanography Association, Board of Directors, Oceanography Man of the Year Award, Congressman ALTON LENNON, Chairman, Subcommittee on Oceanography, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, U.S. House of Representatives

For outstanding service to the oceanography community and the citizens of the United States during the last decade, culminating during 1969 in hearings on the report of the Commission on Marine Science, Engineering and Resources pursuant to legislation he was instrumental in enacting in 1966.

Congressman Alton Lennon's legislative work to advance oceanography in the United States has been in the highest tradition of the U.S. Congress.

Officers and directors of the association, in addition to Dr. Barrow, are as follows:

Dr. William T. Burke, Seattle, Wash.
Harmon L. Elder, Washington, D.C.
Kenneth H. Drummond, Washington, D.C.
John H. Clotworthy, Miami, Fla.
Vincent R. Bailey, West Palm Beach, Fla.
Robert O. Briggs, La Jolla, Calif.
Dr. Wayne V. Burt, Corvallis, Oreg.
Dr. W. M. Chapman, San Diego, Calif.
Dr. Richard A. Geyer, College Station, Tex.
Dr. Theodor F. Hueter, Seattle, Wash.
Dr. Columbus Iselin, Woods Hole, Mass.
Dr. John A. Knauss, Kingston, R.I.
Gordon Lill, Encino, Calif.
Arthur L. Markel, Miami, Fla.
John D. Moody, New York, N.Y.
Dr. William A. Nierenberg, La Jolla, Calif.
Dr. David S. Potter, Milwaukee, Wis.
Taylor A. Pryor, Oahu, Hawaii.
Admiral Arthur W. Radford, Washington, D.C.
C. M. Shigley, Midland, Mich.
Dr. F. G. Walton Smith, Miami, Fla.

GHANAIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. ADAM C. POWELL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, the Republic of Ghana is one of the new sovereign states in Africa, attaining its independence in 1957. Most of this southwest African country was known as the British Gold Coast Colony until that year. Then the people of the colony and their leaders convinced the British of their maturity. The British added a part of the adjacent Togoland territory and witnessed the birth of the Ghana state.

Ghana is a fairly large country, 91,000 square miles in area, but not a very rich land. The principal occupation of its nearly 8 million inhabitants is farming, cocoa being their main and by far the most cash-producing crop. The people of Ghana have done well in their domestic economy, and their leaders have shown remarkable ability in reconciling the divergent interests of the numerous tribal-ethnic groups within the country. The administrative machinery of the government, with an elected President and a national assembly, has worked satisfactorily. We salute the independent and free people of the Republic of Ghana on the anniversary of their Independence Day.

MISSING, DEAD, OR CAPTURED

HON. WILLIAM L. DICKINSON

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, for some time now, I have been most concerned and very active in the MIA/POW situation. The wives and families of our American servicemen who are believed to be prisoners of war are faced with problems that would seem to the average citizen to be insurmountable.

Mr. Speaker, recently I read several articles that accurately describe the plight of the serviceman who is a prisoner of war, as well as the families of these servicemen because they have no assurance that their loved ones are dead or alive. In the few cases where the serviceman is known to be alive and a prisoner, the families know nothing of his health and well-being, except for occasional statements of propaganda.

The POW situation is disgraceful and repugnant to every civilized nation in the world. Several articles from the February 1970 issue of Army plus an interview that I had with a former prisoner of the Vietcong, Maj. Nick Rowe, vividly point out much of the situation. At this time, I would like to enter these articles into the RECORD. I urge my colleagues and all concerned Americans to read these eye-opening exposés of Communist tyranny:

[From Army, February 1970]

BETWEEN THE LINES

In a war in which almost everything is fair game for debate, the prisoner-of-war issue has stayed relatively unscathed. Hanoi has found sympathizers in nearly every conceivable aspect of this controversial struggle, but not even the most irrational of the critics have sought to excuse North Vietnam's barbaric conduct in its treatment of American prisoners and their families.

POWs who have had the misfortune to fall into the enemy's cruel hands have been murdered, tortured, humiliated and terrorized in public, used for the most blatant propaganda purposes, and miserably fed and housed by a captor who must surely be one of the most heartless jailers of modern times. His periodic crude attempts to show that this treatment is otherwise only make it all the more obvious that it is not and, if anything, even worse than is generally imagined.

Lately there has been an upsurge of concern over this disgraceful situation, mostly on behalf of the families of prisoners who have been forced to share in the effects of North Vietnam's cruelty through being denied the least that could be expected from the most unconscionable of captors: information about whether their husbands, fathers and sons are alive or dead.

These experiences have created a new breed of war heroines, the wives of missing men who have helped keep hope alive by public appeals and trips to any place where there might be a chance that their pleas will have effect. Despite their efforts and those of the government, private individuals and organizations, the North Vietnamese have refused to release a list of the prisoners it holds.

It was one of these wives to whom ARMY Associate Editor Eric C. Ludvigsen spoke when he was gathering material for his article, "Missing, Dead or Captured?," which begins on page 24. During his search for information, he also interviewed Red Cross officials, spokesmen for the departments of Defense and State, and investigated other sources that would shed some light on the many mysteries connected with the POW problem.

Among the people to whom he talked was a major who spent five years as a prisoner of the Viet Cong. James N. Rowe's account of his ordeal and escape, told to Mr. Ludvigsen during a trip to Lawton, Okla., where the major is writing a book, should be of particular interest to ARMY readers because almost all Army prisoners are believed to be held by the VC.

The POW issue is considered so critical by the Association of the U.S. Army national leadership that the AUSA's Council of Trustees this month took the unusual step of adopting a council resolution condemning North Vietnam for its treatment of prisoners and calling upon it to conform to Geneva Convention terms covering POWs. The resolution follows:

"RESOLUTION

"The actions of the Hanoi government in its treatment of prisoners of war are both shocking and disgraceful. Up to 1,400 members of our country's armed forces who are missing in action may be held prisoner under circumstances and conditions that are in grave violation of not only the Geneva Convention, but of the principles of human decency itself.

"The government of North Vietnam and the Viet Cong have subjected these honorable fighting men to barbaric and cruel treatment. There is evidence that captives have been miserably fed, provided with inadequate or no medical care, ridiculed and reviled in public, subjected to such outrages as beatings and solitary confinement, and exploited for propaganda purposes.

"Hanoi has repeatedly ignored entreaties by our government for the names of men held prisoner. This calculated and cruel omission has had the effect of extending the suffering of the prisoners to their anguished relatives, many of whom do not even know if men now listed as missing in action are alive.

"Despite the fact that the government of North Vietnam is a party to the Geneva Convention on the Protection of Prisoners, its leaders have made a mockery of its provisions. They have not only mistreated prisoners but flagrantly violated such primary tenets as allowing neutral inspection of prisons and permitting such basic amenities as the exchange with relatives at home of letters and packages.

"Spokesmen for North Vietnam and the Viet Cong have sought to justify their despicable conduct by characterizing our troops as "criminals" while callously refusing to even acknowledge pleas for information and humane care by government officials, congressmen, the American public and the wives of missing men. Nor, apparently, has the fact that our side has treated fairly the some 30,000 North Vietnamese and Viet Cong prisoners of war influenced these cruel jailers to even partially reciprocate.

"We condemn this barbaric treatment of American fighting men and their families and strongly endorse the efforts of our government and other organizations and individuals to persuade the government of North Vietnam to live up to the solemn promises it made when it became party to the Geneva Convention and to convince the Viet Cong to do likewise.

"THE COUNCIL OF TRUSTEES, ASSOCIATION OF THE U.S. ARMY,
"ELVIS J. STAHR, Chairman."

MISSING, DEAD, OR CAPTURED?

(By Eric C. Ludvigsen)

(NOTE.—The welfare of untold hundreds of American soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines suffering in Hanoi prisons and Viet Cong base camps is of no concern to a regime which systematically flouts provisions of the Geneva Convention in search of even the slightest propaganda advantage. It is cynical, deplorable, barbarous—and straight out of the textbooks of "revolutionary people's war". With normal channels closed by the enemy's intrasigence, there is a growing belief that forceful, united protest is needed to make North Vietnam's shameful treatment of U.S. prisoners a political liability in the eyes of world opinion.)

The end of American innocence concerning international standards for treatment of battlefield captives arrived sometime during the Korean War. To be sure, American prisoners had suffered horribly in earlier wars, through local instances of wanton murder—Malmédy and, through gross mismanagement and casual brutality, Bataan.

But it was that first large-scale conflict with a communist power that witnessed the cynical, systematic use of men no longer able to defend themselves as instruments of propaganda value in political warfare.

It seemed to work out all right, however. After 15 months of hassling at Panmunjom over the POW issue, there was an armistice and a prisoner exchange. Our men, so most people think, came home.

Not quite. At the close of hostilities, 944 U.S. servicemen whom we had reason to think had been alive in enemy hands remained unaccounted for. Despite repeated inquiries by the U.S. government and international bodies, not one word has ever been officially received about the fate of these men. Graves registration work in Korea has reduced the number, but well over a third of the 944 has never been heard from—17 years later!

So that is the kind of record we have to contemplate in trying to arrange the ultimate return of U.S. fighting men held by the enemy in Southeast Asia, and to ensure even the minimally decent treatment to which they are entitled under international law while they are captives. At this writing, their immediate prospects are bleak.

In the first place, we—above all the anguished families of these men—have little fully reliable information on how many prisoners there actually are, who they are, where they are being held and by whom. This void is the result of the steadfast refusal of the government of North Vietnam to identify the men it holds, despite five years of appeals by the United States, its citizens and neutral authorities.

As of the first of the year, a theoretical number of 1,354 members of the four services could be in enemy hands. With varying degrees of certainty, 422 are known to be captured or interned in other countries. The rest—932—are listed as missing in action. Some of the missing have probably survived into captivity but no one knows how many. Of the total in both categories, well over half are pilots and air crew downed in the air war over North Vietnam during 1965–68. Air Force prisoners and missing number 750, Navy and Coast Guard 251.

Less understood is the plight of what one Department of State official calls "the forgotten of the forgotten," soldiers and marines missing and taken prisoner in infantry combat and forced by the circumstances of their Viet Cong captors to live a subhuman, itinerant existence in the jungle base camps of the South. Army prisoners and missing total 245 as of 1 January, with 108 marines in those two categories. The low proportion of known captured for these two services—54 and 21, respectively—reflect the relative obscurity of their condition.

As of last November, 70 prisoners were known to be held in the South, two in Laos and 341 in North Vietnam.

Hanoi's refusal to render a true accounting of the prisoners it holds is only one aspect of North Vietnam's total disregard of the letter or the spirit of the 1949 Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War, which it signed on 28 June 1957. The North Vietnamese have not even revealed the location of the prison camps, let alone permitted neutral inspection, and representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) haven't been allowed to set foot in the country.

The convention's provision for regular mail communication between prisoners and their families has been perverted into a propaganda instrument, producing only a trickle of heavily censored mail from selected prisoners at times of Hanoi's own choosing. Barely more than a hundred prisoners have been allowed to write, and few families have ever received more than a couple of letters or cards.

Hanoi has made not even the smallest gesture toward regular repatriation of sick and wounded prisoners, despite several unilateral releases of North Vietnamese prisoners by South Vietnam. All told, nine American prisoners—in three groups of three—have been released from captivity in North Vietnam. A few others have been released by the National Liberation Front (NLF) in the South, usually through a neutral "airlock" such as Cambodia, but one time, last January, in a battlefield meeting near Tay Ninh.

The evidence they have brought back with them gives the lie to Hanoi's principal claim that prisoners are treated "humanely" under a "lenient" policy, despite their status as "major criminals" and "air pirates."

One of the last men to be released from the North, Navy Lt. Robert F. Frishman, publicly exploded these claims shortly after his return last August.

"My intentions are not to scare the wives and families," he told a press conference, "but Hanoi has given false impressions that all is wine and roses and it isn't so.

"I don't think solitary confinement, forced statements, living in a cage for three years, being put in straps, not being allowed to sleep or eat, removal of fingernails, being hung from a ceiling, having an infected arm which was almost lost, not receiving medical care, being dragged along the ground with a broken leg, or not allowing the exchange of mail to prisoners of war are humane.

"Certain prisoners of war have received publicity. Others are kept silent. Why aren't their names officially released? I feel as if I am speaking not only for myself, but for my buddies back in camp to whom I promised I would tell the truth."

And that in a permanent camp in Hanoi where the facilities for medical care, adequate housing and sanitation and decent food at least exist, even if the inclination to grant them does not. The testimony of Army Maj. James N. Rowe and other escapers from Viet Cong camps in the South shows the lot of a prisoner there to be semistarvation, disease, beatings, mental coercion, utter loneliness and—frequently—death.

It isn't known precisely how many U.S. fighting men have died as a result of this barbarous treatment. Officially, 11 soldiers, three marines and an airman are carried on the rolls as having died in captivity. These are only those deaths painstakingly confirmed, largely by ex-prisoners whose knowledge of the fate of their countrymen was limited by isolation. But the experience of one man—Maj. Rowe—was so grim that we can only hope it is not typical. Of the seven Americans who accompanied him into captivity in the fall of 1963, three were released, three starved to death and one was executed. He himself escaped, after "five years, two months, two days and about six hours."

The execution was one of two of American prisoners announced by the NLF on 26 September 1965 as reprisals for the execution of Viet Cong terrorists by the South Vietnamese authorities. Another soldier was executed in June of that year, and in 1967 an Army sergeant and a Marine lieutenant were found to have been tortured and killed shortly after their capture when the enemy positions were overrun a few hours later.

There have been other such murders, though the circumstances are not always as clear. Last July, for example, U.S. and South Vietnamese troops attempted a heliborne prisoner recovery operation at a VC hospital in Quang Tin province.

Sp. 4 Larry D. Aikens, captured two months before, was found "lying just outside the door of a hut . . . bleeding profusely from a fresh wound on the left, top forefront of the skull," according to a Department of Defense summary of the incident.

Sp. 4 Aiken died two weeks later. In the opinion of the attending neurosurgeon, the wound was comparable to that "rendered by a blunt instrument . . . [and] it is unlikely the wound resulted from a missile or shell fragment."

These murders, whether committed in the heat of battle or as deliberate reprisals, speak volumes about the enemy's "lenient" policy. One could not imagine a graver breach of the convention's prisoner of war articles which represent nothing more, really, than minimum standards of decency toward unarmed men who are no longer a military threat.

But if U.S. prisoners no longer threaten the enemy, they represent to him a political asset of great value, and that is what lies at the heart of the uncompromising attitude of the Hanoi government and the NLF on the prisoner issue.

For it is through the prisoners and the anguish of their families that the enemy can hope to reinforce anti-war opinion in this country.

William H. Sullivan, deputy assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific Affairs, told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee last November that "one of the motivations the North Vietnamese have is political, an effort to use the understandable sympathy and concern and worry in this country about these men in a way that will bring pressure to bear on the administration with respect to actual conduct of military and diplomatic negotiations. . . ."

From the enemy's point of view, there is also the chance that the carefully orchestrated program of coercion and indoctrination in the camps will produce men who can be released to do his propaganda bidding in this country. The effort has so far failed, even with those who have signed "confessions" before release, mostly because of the enemy's inability to understand, as Maj. Rowe puts it, "that the U.S. POW is the most insincere person in the world when it comes to signing their ridiculous statements."

In any case, the entire system depends on the isolation of the individual prisoner and on attempts to make him and his family believe that the government that put him in his predicament is now powerless to do anything for him.

Naturally, it is quite logical (or at least correct dialectics) to believe that the communist prisoner policy is "lenient" once you accept the premise that the captives are "political criminals" taken in an undeclared war, and therefore have no rights beyond those afforded them by Vietnamese law.

This argument is, of course, sheer nonsense and the U.S. and international Red Cross authorities have not ceased saying so at every opportunity since June 1965, when ICRC President Jacques Freymond reminded all parties to the conflict that the Geneva Convention clearly applied. The NLF has contended from time to time that it is not a signatory, but the ICRC has consistently argued that the Front is bound by the accession of both North and South Vietnam.

Raising the prisoner issue before the United Nations General Assembly last November, Mrs. Rita E. Hauser, of the U.S. delegation, noted that "North Vietnam, even by the terms of its own arguments, cannot escape its obligations."

"The United States understands that every country believes that it is right and its enemy wrong. North Vietnam has said that it is inconceivable that the captured military personnel of the 'wrong' side should be given equal status to its own soldiers. But . . . the Geneva Convention was designed specifically to meet this problem.

"It imposes upon all combatant powers the obligation to treat military personnel made helpless by their captivity in accordance with a single objective and verifiable standard."

As if there could be any doubt at this late stage, the 21st international conference of the Red Cross in Istanbul last September adopted without dissent a resolution calling upon the combatants once again to respect the convention. The resolution did not name any specific country, but it was sponsored by the United States and its allies and the context was such that it was clearly aimed at North Vietnam. There were a few abstentions in the show-of-hands vote, but both the governments and the national Red Cross societies of the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Yugoslavia, among Hanoi's sympathizers, voted for it.

The Istanbul resolution is only one of the latest of many unavailing appeals over the past five years from many quarters—governments, the Vatican, Red Cross authorities, the secretary general of the United Nations. Hanoi continues on its course, unwilling to separate the prisoner issue from its political aims in the Paris talks; unwilling, in fact, to concede that the U.S. government even has a role in discussions on captive American fighting men.

If Hanoi waits long enough, the reasoning goes, the anxiety and frustration of the prisoners' families will turn into bitterness and resentment against their own government. As time goes on and the issue heats up, the enemy counts on gradual acceptance of the notion that Washington's obstinacy—and not Hanoi's—over the settlement of a war in which it had no business in the first place, is responsible for the plight of the prisoners.

This approach, we must now recognize, has worked many times in the past, but there are a couple of good reasons why it probably won't in this case.

It is doubtful, for instance, whether Hanoi's political strategists really comprehend the courage and understanding displayed by these American military families at a time when they could be forgiven for ceasing to care about anything but the return of their husbands, fathers, sons and brothers.

Take, for example, Mrs. Donald J. Rander, of Dundalk, Md., who has made two trips to Paris to meet with representatives of North Vietnam and the NLF in search of news of her husband, an Army sergeant captured during the 1968 Tet offensive.

She was one of three wives who met with North Vietnamese representatives on Christmas Day, speaking for a group of 58 who traveled to Paris on a whirlwind trip financed by Texas industrialist H. Ross Perot.

"We were told to go home and join the peace movement," she said with obvious disgust. "Where our government is concerned, they are completely noncommittal—they don't want to deal with it at all. They stated that to us definitely."

When she and other wives discussed their husbands' plight with President Nixon in November, Mrs. Rander recalled, the point that stuck in her mind was "that the issue of the POWs and the political negotiations would be separated in the Paris talks."

But what she heard from Hanoi's delegation on Christmas was "exactly the opposite of what the President had told us—it was weird."

The atmosphere of the meeting was "cordial," she said in an interview, but not as encouraging as the friendly face the communist diplomats had put on during her first trip to Paris last August.

"There was a much colder feeling in there this time. We sensed no interest in our problems or in why we were there—they just launched into their speeches about the history of Vietnam, the illegality of our position, et cetera.

"For 25 minutes we sat there and listened to that, trying to break in. When we did manage to get a question or two in, they brushed them aside and started on the speeches again—like a broken record."

Nor did the women have any idea of who, specifically, they were talking to. "They wouldn't identify themselves," Mrs. Rander said, "and I recognized only one familiar face from the first trip—the waiter for the tea-and-cigarette portion of the meeting. We found out who some of the others were later, by reading the papers."

Yet Andrea Rander and the other wives of prisoners and missing men who have organized themselves are willing to endure this sort of frustration if their efforts help only the least bit to focus public attention on Hanoi's intransigence.

"It's a small step," she says, "but every step counts, and I think we are making some progress. It may not be visible to the naked eye, but I feel that we are."

St. Sgt. Donald J. Rander was reported missing in action with other members of his military intelligence team, near Hue in February 1968.

"That was the most tormenting time of all, those awful days," Mrs. Rander recalls. "It was during the Tet offensive, and there was so much of the fighting in Hue on television. I just sat there and watched, hoping that maybe I could catch a glimpse of his face."

That lasted for four weeks, until an escaped prisoner brought word that Sgt. Rander had been wounded and captured. In that respect alone, perhaps, Mrs. Rander is more fortunate than other families; some men have been missing in action for up to five years.

"When I got the letter reporting his capture," she said, "it was a great relief, but then I began to wonder about what it didn't tell." She has not heard a word from, or about, her husband in the two years since then.

Between her efforts on behalf of the prisoners, her regular work as a staff member of the psychiatric "crisis" center at Baltimore City Hospital and her two daughters, Lisa, 10, and Donna Page, 4, Mrs. Rander has few moments to be alone with her thoughts.

"The girls are such good company," she said, "I don't know what I'd do without them. Page really doesn't have that much memory of her father, but now she seems to be more aware of it—she talks about him all the time.

"In the beginning, especially, I was just wanting to give up the house and everything else and move back with my parents. But they told me, 'Look, Donald would want you to go on as before. Keep things as normal as possible and just wait.'

"Now the wait," she adds, "has turned into years."

She has been putting her husband's pay and allotments aside, "because I know there's so much he wants to do, like getting a home of our own."

With a wry smile, she recalls now "how upset Donald was when he got his draft notice. He had a good job then and he sure didn't want to go. When he got in and got adjusted, he found he kind of liked military life—then he had to convince me."

In her work with such groups as the National League of Families of American Prisoners in Southeast Asia and the POW–MIA Action Committee, Mrs. Rander says she finds more interest now in efforts on behalf of prisoners held by the Viet Cong in South Vietnam.

"We've got to start opening doors to the South," she said, "and I heard much more of this on the last trip to Paris."

In the Christmas Day meeting, she said, the Hanoi delegation members "were sort of surprised that two of us had husbands who were prisoners in the South. I asked one member if prisoners taken in the South were detained there, or moved to North Vietnam. He said it was out of his competence, and that I would have to see the NLF."

Mrs. Rander tried that—fruitlessly—on both trips. The first attempt was particularly disconcerting.

She besieged the NLF mission in Paris with telegrams and phone calls in an attempt to arrange a personal meeting with Mme. Nguyen Thi Binh, head of the delegation.

Nothing seemed to work, Mrs. Rander said, "but finally I got hold of a secretary who spoke some English, only to be told that 'Madame Binh is not receiving visitors today.'

"But she did say we could leave packages and mail for our husbands with them, and I left a package of medical supplies there. When I returned to the hotel, there were the packages, sitting in the room, opened and rewrapped."

Mrs. Rander's personal efforts and those of hundreds of others are part of a new, more militant stance on the prisoner question that has been gathering momentum over the past three months. The government must maintain a "hands off" attitude toward the private diplomatic efforts which North Vietnam already believes are officially inspired anyway.

But the administration, including the secretaries of State and Defense and President Nixon himself, has been speaking out much more forcefully on the issue since the middle of last year. The Department of State has given low-key encouragement to publicity campaigns designed to heighten public concern and has testified in favor of congressional resolutions calling upon North Vietnam to meet its obligations under the Geneva Convention.

One such resolution which, along with other similar measures, had the sponsorship of well over 300 members of Congress, has passed the House and is now before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The Johnson administration was no less concerned with the welfare of U.S. prisoners, but the issue was soft-pedaled somewhat, partly out of fear of reprisals against the men and partly because it was believed that intergovernmental efforts might still prove successful.

But as Mr. Sullivan told the House Foreign Affairs subcommittee, U.S. diplomatic efforts have produced "a bleak record."

"Although we have pressed North Vietnam by every available means and channel, diplomatic and private, their responses have been uncompromising and negative."

The Department of State now believes, he added, that "vocal public concern about our prisoners may be the most effective way to bring pressure on the communist authorities to treat our men humanely."

Privately, U.S. officials concede that there is a large element of risk in cranking the issue up to fever pitch, but they know of nothing else to try.

For stirring up public outrage in effect encourages North Vietnam's hopes that it may be able to use the prisoners to influence U.S. domestic politics. Outrage is easily misdirected and could turn on the administration itself, creating a major demand for release of the prisoners at all costs. Albeit on a much smaller scale, there was such a backlash among the families of the imprisoned crew of the USS Pueblo, serious enough to hamper negotiations with the North Koreans.

Nevertheless, the record of unanimity on this issues has been impressive. Congressional action, most critically, has received the support of the most outspoken critics of the war in both houses.

Anti-war groups have attacked the American Red Cross for promoting a "letter-to-Hanoi" campaign on the grounds that it supports government war policy.

"But the point is," said an ARC official, "that these prisoners can't be held as whipping boys—they're not guilty of a damned thing. If any crimes were committed, they were committed by the governments who are party to the war not the men they sent into battle."

There is one aspect of the prisoner situation that could be used to divide the nation on this question as with nearly all others having to do with the Vietnam war. That is the treatment of the 31,500 prisoners of war held by the government of South Vietnam, a total which includes 6,500 North Vietnamese regulars.

There have been documented cases of maltreatment in the six POW camps run by the South Vietnamese, but the principal point of contrast with the North is that the complaints have been lodged by the ICRC which is fully established in Saigon.

"Let me be clear that we are not claiming a perfect record on this subject," Mrs. Hauser told the UN last fall. "War is ugly and brutal by nature, and violations by individuals have occurred. The point is, however, that the Allied command has made every effort to ensure that the convention is applied."

One reason why there appears to be no diplomatic leverage of the sort that produced prisoner exchanges in other wars is that North Vietnam has shown little or no interest in the repatriation of its own prisoners.

On the several occasions when South Vietnam has unilaterally released Northerners, Hanoi has gone to extraordinary lengths to avoid any appearance of responsibility for men who it maintained until recently were never there in the first place.

"Consequently," said one U.S. official, "there is no symmetry of interest that could form the basis for prisoner exchange."

When it comes to political advantage, Hanoi apparently regards its own fighting men to be as expendable as ours.

MAJ. JAMES N. ROWE—SURVIVAL OF AN AMERICAN PRISONER: AN EXTRAORDINARY EXERCISE OF WILL

Maj. James N. Rowe, U.S. Army, is the holder of a dubious record: he was a prisoner of war for what is quite likely the longest period of time in American military history.

From 29 October 1963 until 31 December 1968, Maj. Rowe lived and moved with the Viet Cong 309th Battalion over perhaps no more than a 75-kilometer stretch of the fabled U Minh forest, deep in South Vietnam's Delta region. Five years, two months, two days and—he knows as precisely as a man can tell by the sun—"about six hours."

He is also one of a handful of long-term POWs who have managed to escape from this limbo of captivity in the jungle base camps of the South where most U.S. Army prisoners are believed to be held. Through an extraordinary exercise of will and self-reliance, Maj. Rowe managed to survive on the edge of starvation and to maintain his sense of balance in the face of relentless mental pressure. His story thus provides the best record we yet have of what most Army POWs must endure in the half-light world of their guerrilla captors.

Then a first lieutenant and an advisor to a company of Nung irregulars, Maj. Rowe was captured along with seven other Americans when a three-company South Vietnamese force was ambused and overrun by the better part of a VC regiment.

Of those seven, three were released through Cambodia in October 1967, three died of malnutrition in 1966–67 and one—Capt. Humbert R. Versace—was executed in September 1965.

Of the three who starved, Maj. Rowe said that, in a sense, their deaths were "self-inflicted—they stopped eating rice. You keep pushing that stuff down until you puke. They simply couldn't do it any more, and one of these boys was a Filipino who had eaten rice all his life.

"After you stop eating, it doesn't take long for disease to take hold and you can't ever get enough fluids back in your body. Then major organs stop functioning—the kidneys are usually first to go because of the lack of fluids."

Disease and semi-starvation were constant companions for Maj. Rowe and he suffered from dysentery through his captivity. He said:

"Obviously, by American standards, the conditions are low—you are an animal.

"But in all fairness, they do have adequate food by their standards. But prisoners get less of it, because they figure they have more activity, in combat, and that you therefore need less.

"What they don't realize is that an American needs a much higher input—a higher protein diet—just to stay alive. It took me about two years to become a rice-burner."

So the diet was rice—of which Maj. Rowe estimates he consumed a ton—with nuoc mam, the ubiquitous rotten fish sauce, the only regular source of protein.

"They were concerned with keeping Americans alive, and they had a requirement from higher headquarters to do so," he added, because you are valuable as a propaganda commodity."

In the last year, when Maj. Rowe was the last American prisoner the unit still held, he was furnished with gill nets and fish lines, and there might be vegetables "every three or four months." Anything else was the gift of ingenuity, such as the fried cakes he learned to make from snake fat, snake eggs and rice flour.

"The one think you think about most," he said, "is food. I often occupied myself mentally by planning menus—breakfast, lunch, dinner and even midnight snacks."

As for medical treatment, Maj. Rowe received none, other than a shot of vitamin B_1 and a bottle of weak merthiolate out of a session staged for a propaganda photographer shortly after the capture. The merthiolate was adequate for the light small arms wounds he suffered in the action, but he had to pick mortar fragments out of his arm himself.

Though American captives of the VC in other areas may move around more, Maj. Rowe spent the entire five years in only two different areas of the Ca Mau peninsula. From January 1965 on, he was held in camps deep in the U Minh forest, which "up to that time," he said, "was pretty safe for the VC—the South Vietnamese were reluctant to go in there because of all the old legends about the place."

"Once they get an American, they want to move him around as little as possible," he said, because of the difficulty of guaranteeing prisoner security.

Typically, prisoners live in huts arranged in a semicircle around a central guard post 30 or 40 meters apart—just enough distance to make the prisoner aware of the presence of comrades, thus deepening an already profound sense of isolation. Attempts to communicate usually earn beatings from the guards.

Kept in leg irons at night, Maj. Rowe sat day after day, week after week and month after month in a cage about four feet wide, six feet long and four feet high.

"You don't go anywhere outside of that hooch," he said, "except the 15 meters to the latrine in the company of a guard."

Air strikes were a constant threat. One of the camps was shot up by helicopter gunships two days before Christmas, 1964, and it was the confused aftermath of a B–52 strike that gave Maj. Rowe his opportunity to escape.

On the move after the raid, the unit was attacked by helicopters, killing or scattering the guards. Maj. Rowe managed to isolate himself with a single, panicky guard and surrepitiously slipped the magazine out of his captor's submachine gun. After overpowering the guard, he moved to a nearby clearing and waved at a helicopter whose crew first took him to be a VC until the waist gunner noticed his beard. Twenty minutes later he was down on an Allied landing zone.

But physical survival was only one of the problems Maj. Rowe had to contend with, and in his own reflection perhaps not even the most trying one.

"I had had Special Forces training and I was used to living in the outdoors," he said, "and I at least had the trees, the sunlight, the birds. The pilot in North Vietnam might have a little better sanitation, a little better food, but if you put me in four walls, I think I'd crack right away."

In the last year, when he had a little more freedom of movement, he raised squirrels and two eagles, "which I got when they were fluffy little balls."

"But the only communication I had was with the animals. That's what you miss most—sincere human communication. The guards and the political cadre weren't communicating with you, they were just using you and that really tore me up."

Political indoctrination was constant, intense and sophisticated, with lessons, literature and lectures pitched at producing repentent "peace soldiers" for the domestic anti-war movement at home.

Immediately after his capture, Maj. Rowe was given a standard international Red Cross data card to fill out. Appended to it was a lengthy questionnaire, asking full details of personal and military history, military training, local tactical intelligence.

"I told them that, under the Code of Conduct, I couldn't give them any of this. But for the first six months, they aren't going to push too hard. They have all the time in the world and they convince you of this.

"I was told, 'Go back to your cage. Sit there for a week or two. Think about it, then we'll talk to you again. We'll tell you the truth of the situation in Vietnam. If you don't believe us today, we'll tell you again tomorrow, and the day after that.'"

Maj. Rowe found the political cadre, most of who were Hanoi-trained Southerners, to be "extremely sophisticated in everything they do."

"They keep you off balance, and there doesn't seem to be any pattern to their actions at first. I can begin to see the patterns now—every action has its reason or purpose."

The entire system, he said, depends on isolating the prisoner and convincing him that he is utterly alone and helpless, totally at the mercy of his captors and far beyond the protection of his own government.

"The prisoner is told that he is a political criminal taken in an undeclared war and that he is totally subject to the enemy's laws. He is told that, therefore, they can do anything they want with him, including killing him, and that anything that is done for him is the result of a "lenient policy."

Maj. Rowe and Capt. Versace "failed" an indoctrination lesson in March 1965 and were sent to a punishment camp where the diet was rice and salt—without water.

"He was chosen for execution," Maj. Rowe said, "and later we heard on Radio Hanoi that he and Sergeant [Kenneth M.] Rora-back had been killed."

"I'm quite sure I was marked for execution too, because I knew by then that they would never release me."

Spurred on by that thought, Maj. Rowe and another prisoner took advantage of a rainy, mosquito-filled night and an especially dense guard to make an escape attempt.

"We wanted to follow the canals to a river and then float downstream," he recalls. "We got about six kilometers from camp and then left the canal system to go overland to another. That was our mistake—we completely lost direction, started going around in circles and wound up about 1½ kilometers from the camp."

This unsuccessful attempt earned Maj. Rowe seven days of "correction," of which he says only "I can't talk about it. They have a job to do and they do it."

In any case, he said, "it's very effective. It was a long time after that before I could even think of the word 'escape.'"

In 1967 and 1968, Maj. Rowe said, the political cadre threw all their old lesson plans away and started to quote from U.S. sources.

"You're in a news vacuum, of course, except for the stuff they choose to give you. I knew the extent of the anti-war movement and I knew it was larger than in '63, but it never really entered my mind that the senators and congressmen they were quoting against the war effort were actually saying these things.

"The thing that really got to me was when the cadre began to tell me, 'very soon, the people of the United States will decide this was all a mistake and you and all of your friends will have suffered and died in vain.'"

Last fall, Maj. Rowe created consternation in political Washington and was condemned on the Senate floor for publicly attacking some of the politicians and publications he had quoted to him in captivity.

About that he is entirely candid. "It's very difficult," he said simply, "not to be subjectively involved in something like this."

An artillery officer since graduating from the U.S. Military Academy in 1960, Maj. Rowe now hopes to be able to switch his branch to intelligence where he feels his hard-earned knowledge of the enemy could be particularly valuable. If successful, he would like to return to Vietnam in the early autumn "in time for the enemy's fall offensive." In the meantime, he is on extended leave writing a book about his experiences.

A native of McAllen, Texas, Maj. Rowe joined the Special Forces in 1961, serving first with Company D, 7th Group, at Fort Bragg, N.C. He studied Chinese at the Army Language School in 1961–62, returning to Fort Bragg and the 5th Special Forces Group before going to Vietnam in July 1963.

SPECIAL NEWS RELEASE FROM CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM L. DICKINSON, NOVEMBER 14, 1969

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The following is the complete text of an interview between Congressman Bill Dickinson of Alabama's 2nd District and Major James N. Rowe. Major Rowe was a prisoner of the Viet Cong for over 5 years. Major Rowe was a prisoner of war longer than any other American in any war in the history of the United States.

DICKINSON. Hi, I'm Bill Dickinson, Congressman from the 2nd District of Alabama. I have with me here on Capitol Hill (in the studio with me) one of the most remarkable fellows I have ever met in my life. Recently, I have been very active in the Prisoner of War problem of the American servicemen in Vietnam and those who are missing in action. As a result of my activities, I came in contact with Major Rowe who is with me today and he has a remarkable story to tell. So remarkable, in fact, that I think that you and all American citizens should hear it. As a result of my contact with him, I invited him to come to Washington and, at the request of Chairman Rivers, he spoke to the House Armed Services Committee. Major Rowe, as a result of your speaking to the Armed Services Committee, what's happened since then?

ROWE. Well, sir, I didn't really expect all that did happen. I had a chance to visit with the President of the United States; I've seen probably more Congressmen than I knew ever existed, and I had a visit yesterday evening with my boss, the Chief of Staff.

DICKINSON. Well, you went to the White House and visited with President Nixon first, is that correct and that was directly after your tremendous presentation to the House Armed Services Committee? How long did you talk with him, and were you able to get any point over with him? Were you able to really do any good, that you felt, to tell him what is going on with the POWs in Vietnam?

ROWE. Yes sir, I think he is very interested in this and I had the opportunity to spend about 20 or 25 minutes with him.

DICKINSON. Well, that's great because, you see, what I failed to tell the people is that you have one thing that nobody else can claim and that is you were held prisoner of war longer than any soldier has ever been held prisoner of war in the United States. How long were you a prisoner of the Viet Cong?

ROWE. About 5 years and 2 months sir.

DICKINSON. Five years and 2 months as prisoner and you were kept in the Delta all of this time?

ROWE. Yes, sir, I was in the Mekong Delta, it was in the U-Minh Forest which is along the western border.

DICKINSON. And you met with the President, then you met with General Westmoreland, the Chief of Staff?

ROWE. Yes sir.

DICKINSON. And you had a long conversation with him, I understand. You were also invited, and did appear, on the Today Program, is that right?

ROWE. Yes sir, I did. I had an opportunity yesterday morning; I got up at 4 o'clock in the morning to appear on the program.

DICKINSON. Now as I understood it, you were going to comment on The Today Program on the peaceniks and beatniks and the other misguided people . . . in connection with the Moratorium: were you asked anything about it on The Today Program?

ROWE. No sir, I think I made a mistake, I let my views be known before we went on camera.

DICKINSON. Well, you were supposed to go on for 14 minutes?

ROWE. We had 14 or 15 minutes initially, sir, and when we finally got on it wasn't that long at all.

DICKINSON. They never asked you one question about the Moratorium, is that correct? (Major Rowe nodded in the affirmative.) Well, we'll get to that in just a moment. But in 5 years and 2 months of captivity tell me a little bit about your physical treatment, how were you treated and what did they do to you?

ROWE. Well sir, by American standards you're at a very low level, this is one thing you can't judge it by American standards, because by the Vietnamese standards, under those conditions and that environment, they don't feel that you're that far under them.

DICKINSON. What did you have to eat, for instance?

ROWE. We had rice two meals a day, sir.

DICKINSON. And what else?

ROWE. Nuoc Mam or salt. This is the standard diet, of course, they eat rice, this is the basis of their whole diet and they feel that an American can do the same thing, so it's rice 2 meals a day, seven days a week, month in and month out.

DICKINSON. Were you ever given any meat?

ROWE. Yes, sir; when they could catch fish and had enough for them as well as an excess we got it, generally we got the dead ones.

DICKINSON. By dead, mean rotten?

ROWE. Generally speaking, out of 20 we might get 2 or 3, that's for four Americans.

DICKINSON. Now you told our Committee that you might eat anything that swims, crawls or flies, is that right?

ROWE. Yes sir, you eat for nutritional value and not for taste. If there was anything that we could get our hands on that we could put on a menu, we put it on.

DICKINSON. What was that state of your health?

ROWE. Well initially, sir, in the first 6 months I went down from about 165 to about 115 pounds, and after that I started to learn to eat rice and build back up. The diseases I had, I had dysentery for five years, berri berri, hepatitis, and a fungus infection which is prevalent among Americans in that area.

DICKINSON. Are you all right physically now?

ROWE. Well sir, they got everything straightened out except dysentery and it will take a while with that.

DICKINSON. You say for 5 years you suffered with this illness?

ROWE. Yes, sir.

DICKINSON. Well now, how could you keep going for 5 years? I understand they kept you in leg irons at night and you were caged; how could you keep going for 5 years living in these conditions?

ROWE. Well sir, you make up your mind not to die there. In other words, you have three things that get you through, and they're all faiths; one is faith in God, one is faith in the Country, and one is faith in the other POWs. And if you've got those three things, you can make it.

DICKINSON. Now you would really say that you contribute your life, then, to your faith in God, your faith in Country, and your faith in the other POWs?

ROWE. Yes sir, these are the three things.

DICKINSON. Well, did anything happen that would shake your faith in God, or your Country or the other POWs while you were there?

ROWE. Well, the faith in God I don't believe a VC can shake that because they don't understand it, they don't believe it so they don't understand it. Faith in Country was one thing that they did attack, probably more often than anything else. They took, well, I divided it actually into two periods of time, the first between 1963 and 1967, the latter part of 1967 as the first period and the second period between October of 1967 and December of 1968. The first period of time they drew strictly from communist sources for propaganda, in other words, to try and convince us that our efforts in Vietnam were wrong, that the American Government was not representative of the people, that there was a great rift between American people and the Government.

DICKINSON. Was this effective with you and the other POWs?

ROWE. No sir, it's a Vietnamese writing for American consumption and it's not really that effective; but in the latter part of 1967 and early 1968, they stopped drawing from their own sources and began to draw from AP, UPI, Time, Newsweek, Life, Look, Washington Post, New York Times. They picked statements from people within our own government, people within the United States, figures that are known and they quoted their statements opposing our efforts in Vietnam.

DICKINSON. Is this, then, the thing that was most effective in shaking your faith in yourself and in your Country and willingness to live?

ROWE. It was the only time during the entire period of time that I really doubted whether or not I was really right.

DICKINSON. Well, would you say they were principally government figures, or did the hippies and the yippies on the street, what did they quote that was most effective?

ROWE. Well sir, they would say them all in one breath and you would have a whole line of people within the government, and then they would come with Stokely Carmichael, Rap Brown, Eldridge Cleaver, Tom Hayden, Benjamin Spock.

DICKINSON. And who else within government?

ROWE. Mr. Mansfield, Mr. Morse, Mr. Fulbright, Mr. McGovern, were the ones I heard more than any others, sir.

DICKINSON. The four Senators?

ROWE. Yes sir.

DICKINSON. Now getting back to the Moratorium, the people who think they are going to effect a quicker peace by bringing about demonstrations. You were a captive for over 5 years, you learned to speak the language, you learned to know the mind of the Vietnamese, do you think the Moratorium demonstration and the people walking up and down the streets with the placards, is this going to hasten the day when the hostilities will cease or do you think it will strengthen the determination of Hanoi to fight til the bitter end?

ROWE. Two things, sir, the Viet Cong, this comes from one of their political cadre, a provincial level political cadre, a communist and member of the Lao Dong party; he said that we do not expect a military victory nor do we expect an immediate political victory, but through the demonstrations and disorder in the United States, the anti-war movement, the United States Government can be robbed of its support of the people and forced to withdraw from Vietnam. At that time we will have total victory. At the same time, considering this even further, if you take their attitude towards negotiations where they regard conditions as a sign of weakness, it's only going to bring further demands. And if they win in Vietnam, that will not be the end but the beginning. This is the thing that's important to the military, and I as a military man.

DICKINSON. You told us you were preached to daily, you were politically indoctrinated or attempt was made almost daily, and you became familiar with their overall plan. First, what do they expect to accomplish in Vietnam, are they up to or behind schedule, what can we expect from them?

ROWE. They're behind schedule, sir. They were supposed to over-run Vietnam and have total victory in 1965, but President Johnson averted this by putting in United States troops.

DICKINSON. And is it true that this is just one apple on the bush?

ROWE. It's a very large tragedy, sir, and it expands throughout Indo-China.

DICKINSON. Now, are you sure that if it had not been for our action in Vietnam that the South Vietnamese would have fallen by now and they would probably be into other countries, is this your feelings?

ROWE. Yes sir, the NVA, they are the imbalance. The North Vietnamese are the imbalance and at that point they could have put enough men and enough communist equipment into South Vietnam to overrun the country.

DICKINSON. And you're convinced, as I am, having been there twice, that Thailand, Laos, Cambodia will all fall if we drew out and give in without securing South Vietnam?

ROWE. Sir, they will maintain the momentum of victory and it will carry through Laos and Thailand.

DICKINSON. And you're convinced that regardless of whether we should have been there in the first place or not, we're doing what is necessary now. Tell me, what do you think will be the effect if the demonstrators would have their way and we would just pull out right now, what would be the effect?

ROWE. It would be a blood bath. The communists promise in their political program, this is the political program of the Liberation National Front, and the way they state it, we will severely punish the diehard, cruel agents of the American imperialists and their lackies in Saigon, which is a blanket purge and it's going to be one of the bloodiest that they've ever seen in Asia, and they won't stop.

DICKINSON. Well, we saw that they killed over 3,000 at Hue during the Tet.

ROWE. That's on offensive, sir, and imagine if they take over the country.

DICKINSON. I'm convinced that what you say is right. Now there were two things that you told our Committee. First, that you were marked for execution and that you did escape. What made you think that you were marked for execution and how did this come about?

ROWE. Well sir, I had a period of time that I was going through documents of theirs while they were at lunch. I would just go to where they kept an ammunition box, a 30 caliber ammunition box where they had all their papers. I learned some bad habits in Special Forces and lock picking was one of them. I would go there and pick the lock during this period of time and check out their papers, and whatever I thought was important I would copy down and put it back. I found one paper in there, this was in the latter part of 1968, where a request had come from Zone for the name of an American POW from MR 3 and my name had been submitted and this is a one-way trip as far as that is concerned.

DICKINSON. When you were captured, you gave them what you call a cover story?

ROWE. Yes sir, I did.

DICKINSON. Was this effective and do you think it had something to do with keeping you alive?

ROWE. Yes sir, I maintained this for 4 years and it enabled me to say "I don't know" rather than "I can't tell you", and I think that this was most effective. In 1968, some group, I don't know what it was, but I was called in and the Viet Cong prevention cadre told me that the justice and peace loving friends of theirs in the United States had sent them a biographical sketch on me, which very effectively blew my cover story and marked me.

DICKINSON. Let me get this straight, American citizens, under the cover of being some peace group, had searched your biography and furnished this to the Viet Cong, so it blew your cover story, is that correct?

ROWE. Apparently so, sir.

DICKINSON. And finally, how did you get away?

ROWE. Well sir, I just took advantage of American B-52's and American helicopters and a very trusting guard that I got rid of, broke away from them, signaled the choppers and had American underfire come in and pick me up.

DICKINSON. And escape?

ROWE. Yes sir.

DICKINSON. And you're going back?

ROWE. Yes sir, I've volunteered to go back and I'll go back in 1970.

DICKINSON. You're the most remarkable man that I know. Thank you, Major Nick Rowe.

FIFTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. MICHAEL A. FEIGHAN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on March 25 lovers of freedom all over the world will commemorate the 52d Anniversary of the Declaration of Independence of the Byelorussian nation. I am moved by a feeling of sincere admiration and respect for a people who have, since the beginning of their history, been threatened by oppression and assimiliation, yet who have never ceded their love of liberty and human dignity. We look to captive peoples such as the Byelorussians as symbols of courage and determination.

There is no need to describe the life the White Ruthenian must lead under Communist domination. We would do well, however, to ponder for a moment the conditions which are beyond our imagination as free and comfortable American citizens. Government censorship, educational suppression, cultural oppression, and political takeover is reality for Byelorussia, and nothing short of total independence will preserve her human rights.

With miraculous strength, the oppressed have resisted. At every challenge to their freedom, the Byelorussians have fought for their human rights with the courage of the world's great heroes. With few respites, they have known only war, foreign occupation and oppression, yet they have defied the Communist threat by publishing underground newspapers, opening cultural avenues, reviving their language, celebrating their folklore. Their undaunted spirit during the first years of the century, their foresight in seizing the opportunity for liberation led to the moment that we celebrate: March 25, 1918, the declaration of independence.

The self-declared freedom was short-lived, however, as the Byelorussian government was forced into exile not long after independence day. Now the White Ruthenian people continue to suffer oppression in all of its heinous forms. Their national spirit has awakened the spirit of all of Central Europe, even though their government is occupied by a foreign and tyrannical ideology. The oppressed deserve our recognition, they deserve our compassion, they deserve our admiration. May we never forget the Byelorussian spirit and may the ideals which keep that spirit alive remain as strong as they are today. My sincerest hope is that someday soon we can celebrate Byelorussian Independence Day with our European friends when East and West join in lasting peace.

MONTANA'S STREAM PRESERVATION LAW

HON. LEE METCALF

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, on previous occasions I have taken note of Montana's stream preservation law, which informed conservationists regard as a model statute for reconciling differences among those who would build the necessary highways and those concerned primarily with our environment.

The law was discussed at some length today at the North American Wildlife Conference in Chicago by John C. Peters of the Montana Fish and Game Department. Mr. Peters called the law "a social document that applies a mixture of biological and engineering principles to protect a part of the environment." As he says, the law "illustrates that the public wants to maintain a quality environment and will pay for it."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Peters' address be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPERATION SINCE 1963 UNDER MONTANA'S STREAM PRESERVATION LAW

(Address by John C. Peters)

A day seldom passes without some mention in newspapers, on the radio, in the weekly magazines, or over television of the destruction of the environment. The public is aware that serious environmental problems exist. Their attitude today is that they want to live in a high quality environment, relatively free of any kind of pollution even if it means paying higher taxes or a higher price for products. This attitude could only be held in an affluent society such as ours where the more basic needs of food and shelter are adequate for most people.

Protection of trout streams from the bulldozer and dragline is only one small part of the struggle for the maintenance of a quality environment. However, such protection is a milestone because the people of Montana have achieved some success in the preservation of this important part of the landscape. A law called the Stream Preservation Law is the reason for our success. Years of disappointing efforts showed that moral indignation or social alarm will not save a meandering stream from a bulldozer. Only the legal process with delegated responsibility will do the job.

Before Montana had its law, the road builders listened to alternate proposals but the final plans included only incidental considerations for the preservation of the trout stream environment. The Instructional Memorandums of the Bureau of Public Roads were not adequate because there were no provisions to settle differences. Legally, the road builders had no responsibility to consider requests aimed at stream protection. Only after passage of the Stream Preservation Law were we able to work out compromises that allowed the building of roads without the needless destruction of streams and the surrounding valley floors. The compromises came relatively easy once the legal framework was provided by the Montana Legislature.

HISTORY

In 1960, there was major conflict with the road builders concerning the harmful effects of road construction on trout streams. After a history of attempting to get adequate consideration for preserving the stream environment, it became painfully clear that they would listen, but could not implement major proposals for minimizing damage. We had no recourse but to ask the legislature to give us the legal framework to protect our stream resources from the bulldozers. Faced with that task, it was obvious that facts were needed before we could adequately support our case.

So, in 1961, a pilot study was initiated on the Little Big Horn River to develop methods for measuring channel alterations and their impact on fish populations. Using the techniques developed on this pilot study, each of seven fisheries districts measured at least one stream in 1962. We completed inventories on 13 streams and rivers located throughout the state and the results showed that far more of the trout stream environment had been tampered with than we had suspected (Peters, 1964). Two other states, North Carolina (Bayless and Smith, 1964) and Idaho (Irizarri, 1969) have completed statewide channel inventories that show the same trend. All of these studies conclude that altered channels carry far fewer game fish than natural channels. Also, a study of channelization in the Little Sioux River in Iowa revealed that the channeled portions carried far fewer game fish than the natural channel (Welker, 1967).

As we presented the results of the stream channel inventory to various civic organizations, we gained the strong support of the Montana Junior Chamber of Commerce. Later, they received a National Conservation Award for their part in obtaining passage of Montana's first Stream Preservation Law. The Montana Wildlife Federation also pitched in with the Western Association of that Federation providing noteworthy leadership. Together these groups supported by the data convinced a rather reluctant legislature that Montana needed a Stream Preservation Law. One was passed which became effective on July 1, 1963, but only for a two-year trial period. Thus we had to repeat our efforts in 1965. Armed then with facts from channel inventories on 16 streams, and the record of not having stopped the entire road building program in Montana during the previous two years, we enlisted the support of several groups. These efforts were successful because a permanent law was passed in 1965.

The following facts based on the channel inventory were presented at the 1965 legislative committee hearings:

1. That 354 of 987 miles (36%) of channels surveyed had been altered from their natural condition.

2. There were 2,401 alterations counted, nearly three per stream mile.

3. Altered channels produced only one-fifth the number of game fish and one-seventh the weight of game fish as natural channels.

These facts played an important part in convincing the legislature that protective legislation was necessary to maintain a valuable natural resource, Montana's trout stream fishery.

Examining the voting record of the Montana legislautre on this issue will give some insight into the desirable effects of a well-planned implementation of a good law. In 1963, the first law narrowly passed the legislature (with the House voting 53–33 and the Senate voting 32–21) and became law for a two-year trial period. The bill was killed twice in committee, only to be pulled out and passed after some interesting political maneuvering. In contrast, the 1965 legislature enacted a permanent law with only one dissenting vote from a possible 146, which was cast by a road contractor. I believe the change in the voting between 1963 and 1965 is excellent testimony in favor of exerting every effort to make a good law work.

The Stream Preservation Law covers only agencies of the state and subdivisions of state government, i.e., cities and counties. The State Water Conservation Board is exempt. The law gave no jurisdiction over private landowners, corporations or federal government agencies.

There were two important changes made to the original law by the 1965 legislature. Most important the law became permanent in 1965 and no longer had to be renewed at each subsequent session of the legislature. The arbitration committee under the 1963 law was made up of a member designated by the Fish and Game Commission, a member designated by the agency involved, and a third member who had no connection with either agency, selected by these two members. Under the 1965 law the three-man committee is appointed by the district court.

THE LAW ITSELF AND HOW IT WORKS

Both the 1963 law (Chapter 258, Montana Laws of 1963) and the 1965 Law (Chapter 10, Montana Laws of 1965) have identical preambles: "An act to establish the policy of the State of Montana on protection of fishing streams, providing for submission of plans for construction and hydraulic projects affecting such streams to the Montana Fish and Game Commission and for review of such plans; and providing for arbitration of disagreements between the Fish and Game Commission and the Agency proposing such acts." The following is a brief summary of the sections of the act itself and describes the mechanical operation under the current law:

1. The Fish and Game Commission is notified of a project affecting a stream on a special form accompanied by detailed plans and specifications. These documents must be provided not less than 60 days prior to the start of construction.

2. The Commission examines these plans. If they are inadequate, they so notify the applicant and may aid him in preparing better ones.

3. Within 30 days after the receipt of such plans, the Commission notifies the applicant whether or not the project affects any fish and game habitat. If the project is harmful to habitat, the Commission recommends alternatives which diminish or eliminate such effect.

4. If these alternatives or recommendations are unacceptable to the construction agency, they must notify the Commission within 15 days after receiving such alternatives and the disagreement is arbitrated. A special arbitration procedure is spelled out in the law which is binding on both parties.

However, we have learned that a much more practical operation exists with construction agencies than that formally spelled out by the law. Somewhere between 10 and 15 percent of the total cost of a highway construction project lies in its design. Once an alignment has been selected and the plans are completed, there is little opportunity for change without great cost to the construction agency. Considerable delay occurs while the project is being redesigned, too. Therefore, the conservation agency must be notified by a construction agency and be allowed to participate as a partner before such design plans are developed. In the jargon of the road building agencies, this means notification to participate on the P-line (preliminary alignment) or L-line (location alignment) inspections. At this stage, changes are relatively easy to make. This allows the conservation agency sufficient time to make the necessary studies to collect data supporting a recommendation as may be required to justify changes by the construction agency. It is the practical way to carry out each agency's responsibility on a day-to-day, routine basis.

The Stream Preservation Law has been tested by legal decision three different times. One of the counties in the state did not believe the Fish and Game Commission had the jurisdiction to require them to abide by the law. The Attorney General ruled that the Commission did in fact have such authority and required the country to submit a notice of construction of their project influencing a stream.

As a mitigative measure in another case, we asked that a meander be built to replace one that was cut off. A landowner contested the necessity of selling his land for the new meander. After we provided testimony at a court hearing, the landowner amended his complaint admitting the necessity for the taking of his land for the meander. He did not feel he was offered just compensation for his land from the road-building agency and continued the case in this regard. The meander has since been built, with the total cost, including right-of-way, estimated at $80,000.00.

In the third case the law was used to prevent the purchase of gravel from a site within the perimeter of a meander loop. We felt the river could erode its way into the borrow pit area and possibly upset the river's hydraulic regimen in the entire project area. The court ruled that the construction agency had the ministerial authority to make such a decision when requested to do so in accordance with the Stream Preservation Law.

WHAT HAS BEEN ACCOMPLISHED

Two reports (Whitney, 1964 and Peters, 1966) discuss specific accomplishments of the law during 1963 and 1965 respectively. From July 1, 1963 when the first law became effective, until June 30, 1969 we have reviewed legal notices for 259 projects. Of these, we asked for special considerations on 88 projects, roughly one of every three.

Following are the highlights of what has been accomplished during the first six years with the law. Proposed road alignments were moved to avoid encroaching upon the Madison, Big Hole, Missouri and Blackfoot Rivers. Meanders were designed and built in Prickly Pear Creek, the St. Regis River and the Clark Fork River so that the channel was as long after construction as before. Extra bridges to preserve natural meanders were built in the Beaverhead and Missouri Rivers and are planned for the Blackfoot River. Brushy floodplain vegetation, removed to facilitate construction, has been replaced. Channel excavation has been limited to those times of the year when trout are not spawning and eggs are not in redds. An elevated and independent alignment has been proposed and been designed to preserve the St. Regis River and its scenic canyon. All of these fishery-saving accomplishments have been made by working with the State Highway Department with the concurrence of the Bureau of Public Roads, through the effective medium of a good law, which established the framework.

FRINGE BENEFITS

By asking them to follow the intent of the Stream Preservation Law, we now have written agreements with the following federal agencies: Forest Service, Bureau of Public Roads, Bureau of Reclamation, Fish and Wildlife Service, Soil Conservation Service, and the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The agreement with the Soil Conservation Service allows the Fish and Game Department to review each project under the Agricultural Conservation Program that involves work in a stream or river. No federal cost-sharing is allowed on channel work under ACP unless it meets with our written approval. Since channel stabilization work has increased in recent years to the fifth largest expenditures of funds under ACP, this has become an important part of our stream preservation program.

The Bureau of Public Roads has also followed the intent of the law. We have established liaison with the BPR that allows us to review all Forest Highway Projects from the preliminary alignment to the final construction phase.

Depending on individual forests in the region, we have established fair to excellent cooperation with the U.S. Forest Service. There are few problems with high design forest roads as a rule. It is the smaller logging roads designed within the Forest Supervisor's offices that are often troublesome.

In 1969 the Montana Legislature appropriated $100,000.00 to the Department for the construction of recreation lakes. Involved in this program is the utilization of highway fills to impound water. The Fish and Game Department pays the difference in cost between a fill designed for a roadway and a fill designed for a dam embankment. The department has hired an engineering consulting firm to provide the design and right-of-way investigation work necessary for the development of plans and specifications. The State Highway Department provides us at cost with core log data necessary for material and foundation evaluation and with aerial photography necessary for site mapping. This is an example of an extremely efficient use of public money and illustrates what agencies can do when they are really willing to cooperate with each other.

Recently, we obtained a Memorandum of Understanding with the State Highway Department dealing with land isolated by road construction activities. It allows us to have the highway right-of-way personnel act in our behalf to purchase this isolated land for fish and game purposes. In this way, everyone can benefit including the landowner with the isolated land. For example, some fairly large tracts of land will be isolated between the Clark Fork River and Interstate 90. It would be economically impractical to provide frontage road access to these lands, according to the highway department. Therefore, we are developing a plan to use these lands for a major waterfowl development. Since borrowing will be needed to build the road, we will specify where it can come from and the size and shape of the borrow pits. These pits will become duck ponds rather than the traditional eye sores. This agreement will also be used to purchase land needed for fishing access, habitat protection for birds and fish, game checking stations, etc. It is not limited to interstate highways, but can be used along new primary and secondary roads as well.

The Stream Preservation Law has been indirectly responsible for developing a more rational basis for our stream management program. Often we are asked by the construction agencies to justify our request for mitigative measures. This means measuring fish populations and providing reports describing the fishery for such justification. We have allocated time and manpower to do this in our fishery districts. Special jobs have been set up and work carried out over a long period of time to gather data for the stream preservation program. Because of this, the whole fisheries staff has increased its capabilities and practical know-how in accurately measuring stream and river fish populations.

WHAT IS LEFT TO BE DONE

Almost all of our effort in preserving the stream environment has been devoted to the preconstruction phase of road building. This phase allows us (1) to review and adjust alignments, and (2) to work out measures for fishery mitigation. However, this effort does not do the entire job for maximum protection of the environment. Our effort up to now only enables us to keep between two-thirds and three-fourths of the stream environmental problems in our management grasp. However, to improve our ability to preserve the entire stream environment, we must get involved on a day-to-day basis during the construction phase of road building. This will involve a great improvement in our understanding of just what can be done and what cannot be done when the contractor is building the road. We may have to change or refine certain measures for habitat mitigation once this knowledge gap is closed. Trained biologists must be hired to work with the construction engineer in this important problem area.

Under our D–J fisheries program, we have evaluated a few of the channel mitigative measures to determine their value for fish. But we do not have the money or manpower to begin to evaluate all the important measures that have been designed and constructed for aquatic life. We need more money and people to do this work. Until such a program is operating we are proceeding under the belief that channels that behave well hydraulically also provide the best environment for fish. With or without a more adequate evaluation program, we must work closely with the engineering community to better understand flow in natural channels as it relates to fish.

CONCLUSIONS

The Stream Preservation Law has provided for the trout stream environment in Montana. It has shown the public that a construction agency and a conservation agency can work together given the necessary legal framework. One measure of the relative effectiveness of the program is the $100,000.00 appropriation for the Recreation Lakes Program granted to the Fish and Game Department by the 1969 legislature. This program would not be possible without the close cooperation of the State Highway Department, cooperation initiated by state law which detailed agency responsibilities.

We have achieved a measure of success by being able to work in the preconstruction phases of the road building program. We will have to begin working on a day-to-day basis at the construction phase of road building in order to achieve maximum success. The public does not compliment us on what we have accomplished, rather they criticize us on what they feel we should be doing to further preserve the trout stream environment. We must live up to their expectations and work even closer with the construction agencies in order to retain the public's confidence.

This law is a social document that applies a mixture of biological and engineering principles to protect a part of the environment. It illustrates that the public wants to maintain a quality environment and will pay for it. Yet this success has been achieved without economically penalizing the road building effort. Apparently the myth that this law would scuttle the road building program in Montana has vanished. The largest public works program ever conceived and funded by Congress continues in Montana and elsewhere. But there is a difference. We have a legal document which has helped us and the road builders minimize some of the destructive forces in that massive program.

ABM: AN EXPENSIVE MAGINOT LINE

HON. ROBERT L. LEGGETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, an editorial on the subject of the ABM recently appeared in one of my district's outstanding newspapers, the Sacramento Bee. To my mind, the Bee has bopped this boondoggle right on the head. Either the Russians will not expand their SS–9 force, in which case Safeguard will not be needed, or they will expand it and add MIRV, in which case Safeguard will not work even in theory, let alone in practice.

It seems most unlikely that Safeguard will have practical effectiveness under any circumstances. But even the Defense Department admits it will have theoretical effectiveness only if the Soviets expand their SS–9 force but do not incorporate MIRV. Perhaps if we are foolish enough to spend billions on Safeguard, the Soviets will, out of appreciation for our efforts, design their offense to suit Safeguard's capabilities and avoid its weaknesses. But somehow I doubt it.

I insert the editorial entitled "Safeguard Proposal Would Give United States the Illusion of Maginot Line Safety," from the Sacramento Bee of March 4, 1969, in the RECORD at this point:

SAFEGUARD PROPOSAL WOULD GIVE UNITED STATES ILLUSION OF MAGINOT LINE SAFETY

The Nixon administration's latest proposal to expand the Safeguard Anti-Ballistic Missile system amounts to a new Maginot Line mentality and would be an exorbitant economic drain without increasing real national security.

The Maginot Line, it will be recalled, was a prodigious network of fortifications by which the French military imagined it might make German invasion impossible. The Nazi blitzkrieg blasted that illusion by simply bypassing the Maginot Line in a few short weeks. France fell.

What the French failed to perceive clearly—although the then young Gen. Charles De Gaulle importuned against Maginot Line thinking—was that the rapidly shifting developments of military tactics would make the supposed impregnable defense obsolete.

The same failure of perception marks the Nixon administration's faith in the Safeguard system. The President has chosen to listen to those particular military and scientific advisers who believe it possible to erect an impregnable antiballistic missile system and prevent successful missile attack upon the US.

It is typical Maginot Line mentality. But a growing number of military men and scientists see the folly of this illusion of security. Congress should take a whole new look at the Safeguard proposal and insist that the nation's best protection remains in the retaliatory deterrent power of its Polaris fleet.

US Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana, the Senate Democratic majority leader, has warned the full cost of the Safeguard system envisioned by the administration would grow to an ultimate $50 billion or more. That is a ghastly price to pay for an illusion of security.

For as Defense Secretary Melvin Laird himself has conceded, there is no need for it if the Soviets do not proceed with development of more sophisticated missiles and accuracy, and if they do, the proposed, untried Safeguard system could not handle the threat.

It is folly to spend billions on a system which would be useful only if the Soviets tailor their threat to suit its peculiar limitations.

MOVING THE MAIL

HON. WILLIAM H. HARSHA

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. HARSHA. Mr. Speaker, President Nixon's firm resolve to keep the mail of our Nation moving, and his decisive words and actions in that direction, are being commended as realistic, necessary, and courageous.

An editorial from this morning's Wall Street Journal places the situation in its proper perspective, both from the standpoint of the postal workers, and the President's responsibility to retain a "government based upon law."

I commend this editorial to the attention of my colleagues.

MOVING THE MAIL

The first priority in the current mail strike is to get the mail moving. President Nixon recognized as much yesterday when he ordered military personnel to handle essential mail in New York City, where the tie-up started and where the Post Office was still shut down.

At the same time Mr. Nixon stressed that the "overwhelming majority" of postal employes had refused to join the illegal walkout and instead were carrying out their responsibilities. To these workers, as well as to those on strike, he promised full discussions of all grievances—but not while thousands remain off their jobs.

As the President conceded, the economic problems of postal workers in some cases are severe. Still, those problems should be kept in perspective.

The top pay of letter carriers, $8,442, obviously is not high in these inflated times. Perhaps it's worth remembering, though, that the median income for all U.S. families is only about $8,000. Whatever the problems of the postmen, in other words, around half of all Americans are worse off.

Federal employes, moreover, have a degree of job security seldom attainable in private employment. This security is especially great in the Post Office, where the chief change over the years has been a growing demand for service—and personnel.

The real problems the postmen do have run much deeper than money. Ironically, most of the postal workers' unions have been fighting tooth and nail to preserve the politics-ridden system that is mainly responsible for their members' troubles.

Some critics claim the Administration precipitated the mail crisis by tying a postal pay raise to sensible postal reform. If the Administration did in fact link the two, it was showing much more compassion for the workers' real grievances than their leaders were.

It is, for one thing, perfectly clear that $8,442 is a lot more money in some parts of the nation than it is in others. But Congress, setting postal wages largely for political reasons, hasn't been inclined to fix higher wages for one member's constituents than for others.

A semi-independent postal authority, of the sort the Administration proposes, would be flexible enough to take living costs into account. At the same time, of course, it could shear away the political appointees who still occupy many top postal positions, and thus leave many career postal workers stuck in dead-end jobs.

If the postal unions really wanted to help their members, all of them would have been working hard for reform. An $8,442 wage wouldn't look discouraging anywhere if an ambitious postal worker knew that it did not need to be the end of the road.

However serious the problems of any of the workers, they do not justify illegal strikes. The fact that the strikes started in New York is unsurprising; postal workers there have watched while other public employes pulled illegal walkouts—and usually wound up being rewarded with higher pay.

New York has long been known as a "good" labor town, meaning one where the politicians generally knuckle under to the unions. At the state level this shows up in the fact that New York actually pays unemployment benefits to workers who go out on strike. Since the benefits are financed by employers, the companies thus subsidize strikes against themselves.

The Federal Government simply cannot permit itself to get in that sort of predicament. If the postal strikers get away with this power play, there are many other Federal workers only too likely to follow the leaders.

What is at issue, as President Nixon said, is survival of a Government based upon law. If the strikers begin to see that is so, there will be no need for the President to order troops into cities other than New York. He made it clear, though, that he would not hesitate to take whatever steps become necessary.

It was the sort of decision no political leader enjoys making. The postal strikers, however, left a President of the United States no other choice.

SACRAMENTO BEE PRAISES PAUL LEAKE

HON. ROBERT L. LEGGETT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago one of California's most senior capable public servants, Mr. Paul R. Leake, a member of the Senate Board of Equalization since 1952, decided to hang up his spurs.

Paul Leake, a distinguished Democrat, has served half of the 58 counties of California on the State Board of Equalization for the past 18 years—now at 80 Paul has announced his retirement.

Paul was born in Dixon, Calif. on August 26, 1890, and received his schooling at Santa Clara. He developed the Woodland Daily Democrat which he has owned since 1926. The paper is ably managed by his son, Kenneth, since Mr. Leake is in public service.

In 1939 Paul was appointed Customs Collector for San Francisco and later he has consistently been elected to the State Board of Equalization since 1952. He is past President of the California Newspaper Publishers' Association.

The Sacramento Bee was one of the first to pay him tribute last week, as follows:

LEAKE'S SERVICE WAS PRAISEWORTHY

It is a sad day when a public servant who has made such a valuable contribution to good government is lost to public service, whatever the reason. Such is the case with Paul R. Leake of Woodland, a member of the State Board of Equalization since 1952.

Leake, who will be 80 in August, has reversed an earlier decision to campaign for re-election and announced his retirement at the end of the present term. In doing so he is giving up the prospect of a $100,000 income—$25,000 a year salary for the next four years—because it is almost certain he could have been successful again at the polls.

Leake said:

"The people should be represented by a younger man—someone to keep on top of today's frightening problems."

While this is a commendable attitude, it also is too bad because a younger man will have to go some to equal Leake's record.

The Woodland newspaper editor and publisher has served the people of the 25 northern counties in his equalization board district with strength and fairness for nearly two decades. The board is the state's major revenue agency, administering collection of eight kinds of taxes, assessment of utility property and overseeing the counties' administration of local property taxes.

Although a Democrat, Leake first was appointed to the post to fill an unexpired term by Republican Gov. Earl Warren. He has approached his work in a strictly nonpartisan political tradition.

Even before his service on the equalization board, Leake was making a contribution to government. He was collector of customs for the Port of San Francisco from 1939 to 1952.

Leake rates praise and gratitude from the people of California.

POSTAL STRIKE

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

(Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that there are those on the floor today who will attempt to use for their own political purposes the tragic situation due to the interruption of mail service and the present treatment of postal employees.

I, for one, think the President was correct in his move to call out the troops to carry on the essential mail service required by this country. But I am deeply disturbed by the fact that the simple act of passing a pay increase is assumed by some to solve the problems of the Post Office.

I do not think that is going to happen, and I am one of those who supports the corporation, who joins with the distinguished gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) in believing that basic postal reform, giving employees the right to bargain collectively, with binding arbitration at the end of unresolved differences, will achieve the goal of both treating employees more fairly and giving the people of this country better mail service. It is the Congress of the United States that has failed over the years to treat New York employees fairly. It is the Congress which has to bear the responsibility for failing to move in reforming the Post Office.

NATIONAL KIDNEY DISEASE MONTH

HON. GILBERT GUDE

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. GUDE. Mr. Speaker, Mayor Walter Washington has issued a proclamation designating March 1970 as "National Kidney Disease Month." He points out that more than 3,000 residents of the Metropolitan Washington area will die of kidney disease during the coming year, and that many of the victims of the disease are children.

As a member of the Honorary Committee of the National Kidney Foundation of the National Capital Area, I support its work in educating the community about the symptoms and necessary treatment of kidney disease. I have cosponsored legislation to provide funding for a comprehensive program to combat kidney disease and to modernize the laws in the District of Columbia governing the making of anatomical gifts, so that kidney transplantation can be facilitated not only in the District of Columbia itself but also between Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia.

I join Mayor Washington in urging that every citizen learn the warning signs of kidney disease, and in commending the Kidney Foundation for its important work in improving the health of the community.

The proclamation follows:

NATIONAL KIDNEY DISEASE MONTH, MARCH 1970

BY THE COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA A PROCLAMATION

Whereas, the death rate from kidney disease in the Metropolitan Washington, D.C. area is twice the national average; and

Whereas, more than 3,000 residents of the Metropolitan Washington area will die of kidney disease during the coming year, and more than 46,000 kidney disease victims in the Washington area, many of them children, suffer from life-threatening kidney ailments; and

Whereas, the Kidney Foundation of the National Capital Area is engaged in programs to improve the health of the community by providing important health education information about kidney diseases, and is striving to assist kidney disease victims through artificial kidney centers, tissue-typing and kidney transplantation centers, Drug Bank programs, and detection and treatment of asymptomatic kidney infections in school children:

Now, Therefore, I the Commissioner of the District of Columbia, do hereby proclaim the month of March as "Kidney Disease Month," and urge every citizen of the District of Columbia to safeguard the health of his family and his community by learning the "5 Warning Signs of Kidney Disease", and by supporting the Kidney Foundation of the National Capital Area in its efforts to aid kidney disease victims.

WALTER E. WASHINGTON,
Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

FREEDOM'S CHALLENGE

HON. E. ROSS ADAIR

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago Miss Martha Scher of Huntington Catholic High School, Huntington, Ind., won an award in the Voice of Democracy Contest. As one reads what Miss Scher wrote, certainly an admiration for many of today's young people and the soundness and wholesomeness of their thinking is created. Because it is so outstanding, I include herewith Miss Scher's statement—"Freedom's Challenge":

FREEDOM'S CHALLENGE

(By Martha Scher)

"Freedom's Challenge"; just exactly what do these words mean? Freedom or liberty, the power of choice, the positive enjoyment of various social, political, and economic rights and privileges, is thought of so superficially by many. People bounce the word around on the end of an elastic string of American victories, never stopping to think what this expression really means. A brief moment of meditation on the matter will perhaps enlighten the callow minds of those trusting persons who take our freedom for granted.

Freedom is a gift, the result of our forefathers' struggles. For as a consequence of the constant exertion of their intelligence and integrity, we are exempt from life under a Communistic government where misery abounds because of the unbearable stifling of free will. Thanks to them, freedom has become the most valuable resource of our great nation.

Can we export this resource? No, we cannot realistically market freedom in itself. Freedom is not packaged and ready to be sold, you can't just tear on the dotted line and see it come sliding out. But we do export freedom's ideals. We strive to make others see the advantages of freedom's equality, justice and salutary representation of the people in a government. Once other countries realize the good of freedom they too will desire it.

Perhaps a fitting substitute for freedom's challenge could be freedom's demand, since freedom is very demanding. It requires that we be scrupulous in its care. Freedom is a very delicate and fragile substance. Its surface can be easily marred by small incidents which seem so insignificant at the moment. Take for example the election of the wrong man, even in a minor organization. If the wrong man is chosen his wrong decisions can easily result in the stark denial of human rights and the common man's loss of his important representation in government. To insure proper elections, citizens are obliged to keep abreast of the news. Even now as a student, this applies to me. Today's news will be tomorrow's history, and we learn by others mistakes.

My use of voting privileges in school or outside organizations must be a second effort to preserve a realistic form of democracy. By exercising this privilege I am learning the basics of democracy at work.

Action is yet another important cog in the wheel of democratic freedom. Many excellent ideas have been left undeveloped because their authors have failed to put their plans into action. I must not be afraid to make my ideas known so that I might weigh the resulting opinions and contradictions of others. On these results I can base effective actions.

Neglect in the preservation of freedom is indirectly its most bitter enemy. If we become too lax in our ways, sly Communism slips in unnoticed, intent on our conversion to its so-called "carefree" society. We must constantly be on the alert to safeguard our freedom. Being unable to cast a national ballot or indulge in otherwise adult privileges does not in any way lessen my responsibility to be a good citizen. Respect for law and order must be an integral part of my philosophy of life.

Serving in the armed forces is another practical way to insure democracy. If one cannot enter the armed forces, he should do all that he can do on the home front.

Unfortunately, freedom sometimes incites war. But a battle for human freedom, in my opinion, is a just war. Battle for the natural rights is perfectly moral. At the present time many people do not fully appreciate this marvelous substance which is our very life's breath. A person never fully understands the value of that which he so confidently possesses, until that person is no longer the holder of this possession.

To me, freedom's challenge presents a great opportunity which I must take advantage of. If I neglect this responsibility to secure what is rightly ours I will imperil the inevitable future of myself and those to follow me. It is my duty to guarantee that we may eternally enjoy the gift of freedom, that we may always be so privileged to say we are "One nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

SUPPORT FOR LAW ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES

HON. WILLIAM L. HUNGATE

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. HUNGATE. Mr. Speaker, the crime problem needs our immediate attention. The burden on law enforcement agencies increases almost daily and this situation will continue unless we are sincere in our efforts to solve this problem and give them our support.

I am introducing a bill to give this support. My bill would improve law enforcement by making available funds to improve the effectiveness of police services.

With this direct funding, the city or county law enforcement agency could immediately obtain the resources necessary to launch an effective attack on the crime problems of their particular area.

We have placed a great deal of responsibility on our local law enforcement officers and we cannot expect to maintain an efficient force willing to accept this responsibility without our support. The solutions to crime are largely dependent on the ability of these law enforcement officers and, in turn, on our ability to provide them adequate funds to do the job.

TERROR IN THE SKIES

HON. JOSHUA EILBERG

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, for more than a year now, the world has watched as Arab terrorists have bombed and attached commercial airliners and their civilian passengers departing from the major capitals of Europe.

There is little doubt that the world's commercial exchange with Israel and that country's foreign exchange balance will be seriously affected if these barbarous attacks are not halted.

We already have evidence that pilots of Western nation airplanes are reluctant to continue their schedules to Tel Aviv.

Equally significant is the terrorists' absolute disregard for whom their victims may or may not be. Women and children, tourists or statesmen, it matters not.

Yet through it all, we in the free world and the United States have stood by strangely powerless, unable or unwilling through the force of our considerable influence to put a halt to these atrocities.

In a resolution adopted on February 26, 1970, the City Council of Philadelphia adopted Resolution No. 223. The resolution urges the President to use the power of his office to protest and bring an end to this terror in the skies.

With the unanimous consent of my colleagues, I enter the resolution on the RECORD:

COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA
RESOLUTION

Memorializing the President of the United States to use his good offices to protest the mounting rage of indiscriminate terrorism against innocent travelers to Israel.

Whereas, The bomb explosions on Swiss, Austrian and German airplanes killed and wounded the innocent and intended victims of Arab saboteurs exercising the terrorist tactics against the Republic of Israel; and

Whereas, The permissiveness of Arab aggression against Israel has been proved callous in the apathetic reaction of the free nations of the World; and

Whereas, There will be no peace in the Middle East, or in the sky, or on the sea and land, until the international community persuades the Arab States to recognize and enforce the principles of justice against those who hijack and sabotage planes on the ground in foreign airports to terrorize Israeli bound planes and passengers; and

Whereas, Peace will continue to elude all of us in the Middle East and elsewhere as long as the world remains apathetic to the cause of a people asking only to be left in peace while others consume themselves in a passionate craving to enjoy it; therefore

Resolved, By the Council of the City of Philadelphia, That we hereby memorialize the President of the United States to use his good offices to protest the mounting rage of indiscriminate terrorism against innocent travelers to Israel.

Resolved, That certified copies of this Resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Vice President, Speaker of the House, President Pro Tempore of the Senate, Congressional representatives from Philadelphia and United States Senators from Pennsylvania, as evidence of the sincere sentiments of this legislative body.

Certification: This is a true and correct copy of the original Resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Philadelphia on the twenty-sixth day of February, 1970.

PAUL D'ORTONA,
President of City Council.

Attest:

CHARLES H. SAWYER, Jr.,
Chief Clerk of the Council.

KICK THE MILITARY?

HON. BURT L. TALCOTT

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. TALCOTT. Mr. Speaker, we all look forward to an overhaul of the "military draft" legislation. No one likes the circumstances making "selective service" necessary. We all hope for the wondrous day when no draft will be necessary and our Nation, and others, can live in peace with freedom and security.

In the meantime, I believe too many of us overlook the kind, quantity, and quality of service rendered by our Selective Service boards and officials. It is all too easy to criticize the rescue work of the fellow who is performing in the stormy lake while we are observing from a dry, cozy, secure place on shore.

Even though seeming inequities and disappointing decisions may occur, the private and congressional criticism is often grossly exaggerated. Deserving praise is seldom forthcoming.

The director of the Selective Service system for the State of Oregon, Leonard G. Hicks, and John M. Hilgers, the editor of the Rough Draft, the monthly bulletin of the Oregon State Headquarters, published a thoughtful article in the February 1970, edition entitled, "Kick the Military?" The article deserves the careful reading of both Members of the Congress and every citizen of the United States.

The situation in Oregon is not unsimilar to the situation in every other State. We have much for which to be thankful. These citizen soldiers are deserving of our praise and gratitude much more than our criticism.

The article follows:

KICK THE MILITARY?

In order to set the record straight, with reference to a newspaper article relating to certain military personnel recommendations emanating from a Congressional subcommittee, it seems pertinent to acquaint our uncompensated personnel with a little background on our military personnel in Selective Service in Oregon.

Perhaps the Committee was unaware that the members of Selective Service headquarters staffs are comprised of citizen-soldiers—either Reserve officers of the several services, or National Guard officers who have been recalled to extended active duty for this specific assignment. In the Oregon headquarters we have four Reserve officers and two National Guard officers. The four Reserve officers are one Marine, two Navy, and one Army.

These six officers represent the finished product of 110 years of cumulative study and training in Selective Service know-how—background, history, law, procedures, and planning. They are manpower specialists. They didn't become specialists except through constant and diligent study, during weekends or weekly four-hour study periods; by untold hours of homework taking specific correspondence courses; and by substitution of training-conference attendance for the normal family two-week vacation. Often, this training was accomplished at the expense of the individual, without remuneration from the Government. And in the case of our Navy officers, it was attained at the expense of their military careers, from a promotion standpoint. Multiply these efforts by the total number of reserve and National Guard officers throughout the country available to Selective Service in the event of a National Emergency or time of war and you have a staggering number of hours of sacrifice and hard work. All of this has been in preparation for assuming a more active role if they are called to extended active duty to serve the country.

These six temporary active-duty citizen-soldiers represent by civilian profession an educator, a banker, a successful business man, a personnel specialist, a property control and supply technician specialist and a business administrator. Incidentally, these six officers compositely hold five bachelor degrees and two master degrees, and two more have graduate work beyond their degree. In addition to the six officers on temporary active duty, Oregon can rely on twenty-six other citizen-soldiers, reservists who remain in their civilian positions, yet devote the same time to study for preparation for call to duty in time of the Nation's emergency.

A typical Selective Service reserve officer training unit in the State of Oregon is cited. Their civilian backgrounds are: State Director for Veterans Affairs, former State Civil Service Director, Attorney, Law Professor, Ford Agency Owner, Contractor, Teacher, and Accountant for the State Board of Education.

As to the military operating "with less regard for individual rights and procedural niceties than we expect and require in civilian life," the author denotes a misunderstanding of the operations of Selective Service as established by an Act of Congress. The military doesn't make such decisions in Selective Service operations. Selective Service is an independent Federal Agency in the Executive Branch of the Government. It is the many devoted Local Board Members in each community within the State of Oregon who classify and make the decision to defer or order for induction. It is the Local Board Members who devote uncounted hours every month, serving a country in whose ideals and values they still believe, at a time when anything they do and represent is a dirty word. They do all this, in spite of continuous criticism and abuse, as an unpaid volunteer. The wounds from unwitting friends are tougher to take than those from an enemy. Indeed, each one of them must sign an Oath of Office and Waiver of Pay before the Governor will recommend him to the President for appointment. And one of the requirements for becoming a local board member is complete separation from the military— they cannot be a member of the Reserves, or even the retired Reserve. We have something going for all of us—we believe we have the most economical (86% unpaid volunteers) and best run agency in the Federal Government. We, up to the present, have always accomplished our primary mission, making the call placed upon us by the Department of Defense.

It is ironic that the military officers, earmarked to Selective Service, and assigned to the State Headquarters, who are accused by this subcommittee of operating with less regard for individual rights, actually provide such protection as their sworn duty. Remember these officers are also citizens, and as citizens they expect the same individual rights. They appreciate the privilge of serving their country, and still consider it an honor to carry out the mandate of Congress. Did you realize that our last five Presidents had this same honor, as four of them were Reserve officers, and one "even" regular military?

The articulate Rudyard Kipling in speaking of the British soldier, "Tommy", had a relevant observation—

Oh it's Tommy this, and Tommy that and Tommy go away
But it's please to step in Front, Sir When the bands begin to play.

THE PORTLAND JUNIOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HON. EDITH GREEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, one of the most outstanding youth orchestras in the world will be performing this Easter Sunday in a free public concert in Washington, D.C. The Portland Junior Symphony, from my own home city of Portland, Oreg. will play for the evensong services at the Washington National Cathedral, Sunday, at 4:00 p.m.

The Cathedral Choral Society will join the 100 musicians of the junior symphony whose ages range from 12 to 21 in performing Bruckner's Te Deum, which will be the highlight of Sunday's concert.

The visit of these young Portlanders to the Nation's Capitol is of special interest to the residents of the District of Columbia because the Portland Junior Symphony will be joining the District of Columbia Youth Orchestra in international orchestral competition this August in Switzerland. The two youth orchestras will be the only U.S. representatives to this international event.

The Washington concert will be the finale of the orchestra's first European tour which in the last 2 weeks will have taken them to Great Britain, Spain, and Italy.

To be selected to play at such a special event where over 2,500 persons are expected to be in attendance is truly a recognition of the outstanding ability of this marvelous orchestra and its distinguished Conductor Jacob Avshalomov.

I would like to invite all those interested to attend this performance and with permission to include in the RECORD the program for the concert and a brief description of the orchestra and its conductor:

THE PORTLAND JUNIOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

For the first time in its forty-six year history America's first youth-orchestra journeys abroad from its home in the Pacific Northwest Founded in Portland, Oregon in 1924, its reputation spread early across the United States as a result of nationwide radio broadcasts in the 1930's. Later, recordings of its concerts were heard in many of the major American cities, in Japan, the Philippines, and, during the past decade, in Europe on the voice of America broadcasts.

In Oregon the Orchestra became the hub of many activities involving young people. Each year a student pianist is presented as soloist; young guest artists from other parts of the nation are invited; the Museum Art School designs program covers; college choruses have joined in performances of Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms, Orff: Carmina Burana, and Mozart: Requiem. Beginning in 1959 the Association commissioned six works, under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation, and these have been recorded by the Orchestra for Composers Recordings, Inc.

Many cities have looked to Portland for guidance in the formation of their own youth groups, and the Portland Junior Symphony Orchestra is regarded as the progenitor of this movement in the United States. It was established by Jacques Gershkovitch, who conducted it for thirty years, having come to America from Japan. When it fell to his lot to take over a group of children who had been rehearsing under a local violin teacher in 1923, Gershkovitch promptly set the tone of serious work and authentic repertoire. The civic-minded citizens who gathered round to support that activity stated their purposes: "to encourage appreciation and performance of great orchestral music; present public concerts in yearly series; discover and develop talent in children; stress values in good character and endeavor to create a cultural and educational asset to the community through greater love of music."

Over the years these aims have been amply fulfilled. Some three thousand young musicians have been inspired and trained by the Orchestra. Many of them have gone on to the nation's distinguished orchestras, such as the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic; and many more have become the enlightened amateurs of music in our society. The leader of the Juilliard Quartet, Robert Mann, was concertmaster of the Portland Junior Symphony Orchestra in his student days.

Since 1954 the China-born composer Jacob Avshalomov has led the Orchestra, coming to the post after teaching for eight years at Columbia University. There he conducted the American premier of Tippett's A Child of Our Time.

The hundred and more players in the Orchestra come from a radius of fifty miles of Portland, whose metropolitan population is about 500,000. The students range in age from 12 to 21 (the top limit), and are drawn from thirty-five schools and colleges. They are re-auditioned each season, and are seated according to ability—seniority being a secondary factor. A Preparatory Orchestra, also numbering over a hundred players (average age 14), meets once a week, for classes in music theory, sectional work and a rehearsal, all of which is taught by members of the older group or by alumni.

Various opportunities are provided the students by the Association: scholarships for private lessons, which all players are expected to be taking, solo appearances with the Orchestra, study at summer festivals such as Tanglewood, Aspen, Interlochen, and chamber music coaching and performance.

The Orchestra's season corresponds to the school year, and its schedule consists of one full and two sectional rehearsals each week, in the early evening. Six subscription concerts are given, three for adults and three for children, plus a Family Christmas Concert—all in the Civic Auditorium, to audiences averaging 2000.

Schoolchildren are brought by bus from as far away as 100 miles.

Concerts are also given in outlying towns.

Now the citizens of Oregon, without any government aid, have subscribed the considerable funds required for a tour abroad. The Orchestra has been everyone's pet but no one's toy.

In these days when students the world over are in an uproar of contention, here is an activity which has for nearly half a century involved young people, and continues to do so because it is inherently fulfilling. To be a member of this Orchestra is to take up a way of life. Without any of the trappings of a school it has been the very essence of School, perennially attesting to the maxim: "Res severa verum gaudium"—serious things are the true toy.

To share this joy by making music with young people abroad is one of the chief aims of this tour. At a time when nations seem unable to bring the peoples of the world closer together such a joining of hands can only help.

WASHINGTON, D.C.

The Washington Cathedral, Easter Sunday, March 29 at 4:00 p.m.

With the participation of the Cathedral Choral Society, Conductor, Paul Callaway.

THE 52D ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC

HON. LESTER L. WOLFF

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Speaker, March 25 is the 52d anniversary of the establishment of the Byelorussian Democratic Republic.

This gallant republic could not withstand the overwhelming onslaught of the Bolshevik armies and was too quickly swallowed up by the Communist government. Yet, her people throughout history have never lost their belief that freedom will one day again be theirs.

Despite discriminatory restrictions in cultural and economic benefits, this nations people are a tremendous example of how the love of liberty cannot die as long as people hold it in their hearts.

On the occasion marking the anniversary of this courageous land I think it is important that we not only remember that many still yearn for freedom, but that we again reaffirm that we will not rest until freedom is part of all lands.

The Byelorussians view freedom as a most precious gift, and a goal to which they are totally and irrevocably dedicated. It is a gratifying commitment to which each and everyone of us should also pledge our efforts. For without unity in purpose, we will never bring peace to the world. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, today I would like to urge my colleagues to join with me in applauding the tireless commitment of the Byelorussians and to assure them that we will do everything possible to restore their short-lived and beloved freedom.

MEDICAL CARE: IV: MATERNAL AND INFANT MORTALITY

HON. BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks I have discussed some aspects of our national medical care system which reflect the great concern I have for our continued floundering for solutions in this area.

International comparisons provide us some indication of the progress we make in understanding and solving the problem of delivering better medical care. This problem is, of course, distinct from those involving problems of research in specific medical problems themselves. There is much cooperation in the latter; but in medical care our standards represent quite different ways which different countries employ in delivering medical care.

We know today how to reduce infant and maternal mortality drastically, based on the experience of some of these other countries. There is no esoteric research needed to make important reductions although research must continue in the many important disease areas where key elements still elude our understanding.

We know, for example, that proper prenatal care will reduce infant mortality. We know that good diet, adequate prenatal consultation, proper weight and diet control, and a thorough physical examination will cut maternal mortality. We also know, by the figures below, that our country has fallen behind many others in providing these services for every mother-to-be. The price of this neglect is seen in our high infant mortality rate and, in the latest figures just released by the World Health Organization, by our relative regression on maternal mortality.

If we look at the base figures on maternal mortality of 1951–53, we see that the United States had the lowest rates in that period among the 36 countries rated by WHO. Fifteen years later, we reduced maternal deaths from 67.7 to 29.1 per 100,000 live births. But by relative rank we fell to tenth place in maternal mortality. Nine other countries have taken steps in the past 15 years which we failed to take. These nine countries—all of them less affluent than us with the possible exception of Sweden—are delivering the routine but vital prenatal medical care better than we are.

Most of these nine countries are also superior to the United States in infant mortality rates in which the United States ranked 13 among 40 countries selected by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare for comparison in 1967.

For comparative purposes, I also include below this 1967 tabulation by HEW:

PLAUDITS TO THE NEWARK STAR LEDGER

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to insert into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of an editorial that appeared in the March 23 edition of the Newark Star-Ledger. This article, which concerns the problem of drug abuse, points up the need for more effective programs and techniques to combat narcotics addiction.

I think insertion of this article is most pertinent at this time:

DRUG ABUSE

The shocking rise in the use of hard drugs, which one official says has reached epidemic proportions in New York City, has become a matter of concern on this side of the Hudson, too.

It has been gravely complicated in recent years with the unconscionable trafficking among school children. In a special message to Congress, President Nixon estimated the rise in juvenile arrests involving drugs between 1960 and 1967 at almost 800 per cent and the number of users in the nation to be in the hundreds of thousands.

Drug addiction is a tragedy for the individual and for society. A recent study in New York, confirmed by additional studies in other areas, revealed that drugs are being used by younger and younger children. In New York a 12-year-old youngster testified before a state legislative committee that he was able to buy and sell drugs in his school. He became an addict, a mainliner shooting heroin into his arm.

A physician, who has been treating young addicts, told the committee the problem had to be treated like an epidemic. "If we had a cholera epidemic, something would be done immediately," the doctor testified. "Why don't we act that way in this problem?"

The flow of narcotics from New York into New Jersey has made addiction a major problem in this state, too. And it is one that will require a determined effort on a broad front—enforcement, prevention and rehabilitation—before it reaches endemic proportions.

Two Cabinet officials, Attorney General Kugler and Health Commissioner Cowan, told a seminar sponsored by the New Jersey Conference of Mayors that the state was prepared to move with new programs to combat drug abuse. But the federal government must expand its involvement if deep inroads are to be made into drug traffic in this state and others.

The attorney general's office has formed a unit to prepare a law enforcement program based on information furnished by other agencies, at the state and local level. The Health Department is planning a broad drug abuse program based on preventive education in schools, detoxification of addicts and neuro-psychiatric treatment.

It is imperative that the Jersey program against drug abuse should have a sharper focus in the schools, where preventive and educational programs could be especially effective. A simplistic enforcement crackdown, in reaction to an awesome, complicated problem of addiction, is not the answer. There is an urgent, continuing need for research and education to deal with addiction on a long-term basis.

I might add that I hope my colleagues in the House of Representatives will take swift action to remedy the drug menace at the national level. The Congress must recognize the fact that this problem resides not in one or two States, but is ubiquitous. Moreover, drug abusers suffer from an easily contacted illness, one in which exposure tremendously increases the risk of infection. Drug abuse is one area where we cannot vacillate in good conscience.

JUSTICE FOR OUR FLAG

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, the Lansing, Ill. Sun Journal has a reputation for straightforward, responsible editorial policy. Its editorial of Thursday, March 19, commenting on the treatment of our flag is, I believe, especially pertinent.

The editorial follows:

JUSTICE FOR OUR FLAG

A seldom-used statute, employed for the first time in Cook County history, has taken on a far-greater significance than originally intended as a result of recent action by local law enforcers. The statute, invoked by State's Attorney Edward V. Hanrahan in February, involves indictments against desecrators of the United States flag.

"Before August, 1968," Hanrahan explained, the penalty for flag desecration was only a fine." In August of '68, the statute was revised to provide a penalty of imprisonment.

The significance of the change became evident on Feb. 21 of this year when representatives of two groups, Vietnam War Veterans and Polish Home Owners were peacefully picketing in front of the Federal Building to show their support for "Conspiracy 7" Judge Julius Hoffman. During the course of the demonstration, one Patrick Day broke through the ranks and allegedly grabbed a flag carried by Edward Summantas, a Marshall High School teacher.

According to police, the standard broke and Day then tore and spat upon the flag.

As an obvious violation of the statute, an indictment was obtained and Day was arraigned in Criminal Court. The outcome of the trial is still pending. However, the importance of the incident is all too clear.

For once the law has real teeth in it and persons bent on ill-treating our nation's symbol will think twice before committing this cowardly act. A desecrator of the flag will now most likely find himself behind bars instead of paying a fine only to be reimbursed from the coffers of his "cause."

It is unfortunate that our flag has been chosen as the battleground by left-wing extremists. All factions, regardless of their place in the political spectrum, should maintain a "hands-off" policy where our flag is concerned.

Perhaps strict enforcement of the new statute will help others to develop a similar frame of mind on this issue.

METROBANK WOULD PROVIDE LOW INTEREST CREDIT FOR CITIES

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, Vice President Humphrey in an article last fall told the story of the "Metrobank"—the national metropolitan bank system proposed in H.R. 16448—and how it would be a great benefit to local government during the 1970's.

His article is presented here in the RECORD for the information of my colleagues:

METROBANK—A WAY TO HELP CITIES BORROW TO BUILD NEEDED FACILITIES

(By Hubert Humphrey)

Asked to name the three biggest problems facing America's cities, one mayor recently answered, "Money, finances and revenue."

I hear the same story from mayors all over the country—and not just those from big cities. The mayors say they have reached the practical limits of their taxing powers. Further increases in the property tax will only drive more businesses and homeowners out of the city.

Mayors are concerned that any federal aid from the Nixon administration will be too little, too late. President Nixon has slashed education, health, and antipoverty funds. The Administration has let it be known that no funds may be available this year for such vitally needed community projects as sewage treatment plants.

But new community facilities are needed—police stations, water filtration plants, schools, low-income housing. With the need so great and wtih building costs skyrocketing, mayors want to get moving on these projects as soon as possible.

In the past, cities have been able to sell bonds to pay for needed public facilities. The bonds are like a mortgage on a house—the city can build the facilities now and pay for them over 20, 30, or 40 years.

But rising interest rates have dried up much of the municipal bond market. Cities which a year ago could market their municipal bonds at 4 or 4½ percent now have to pay an interest rate of 5½, 6, 6½ percent and more. Some cities can't find buyers for their bonds, or are prevented by law from selling bonds at such high rates of interest. Good bond issues go begging.

In Philadelphia, Chicago, Phoenix, St. Paul, San Antonio, and many other cities, improvement plans have been frustrated by tight money and rising costs.

The White House may be silent while private bankers work their will, but America cannot watch its cities continue to decay. Billions of dollars in improvement and development funds are needed. Cities are at a crisis point, ready to explode.

But there is an answer. It is a new way to help communities borrow money to build needed public facilities. I call it Metrobank—the National Metropolitan Development Bank System.

Metrobank would be an alternative source of low interest credit for cities. It would raise money in investment markets thruout the nation. More important to local government, it would relieve the pressure on bond markets so cities can pay less for money whether they borrow from Metrobank or issue municipal bonds. And this means lower property taxes.

Metrobank would sell federally guaranteed bonds and debentures on the national investment market, and then lend the money to local government at a rate a third to a half less than the rates of the federally guaranteed bonds. Congress would make up the difference in interest rates with an annual appropriation, just as it has done for the Farmers Home Administration, the Rural Electrification Administration, the Small Business Administration and other government banking operations. Because the federally guaranteed bonds would be taxable, the net cost would be low.

Metrobank would be authorized to make long-term loans of up to 40, 50, or 60 years for the building of community facilities—low income housing, slum clearance, schools, health centers.

Equally important, Metrobank would be able to make "soft" loans for up to 20 years if an area has been classified as depressed or where an increase in investment is in the national interest.

Almost as important as its lending function would be Metrobank's ability to serve as an information source for federal programs. There is almost no greater need in America today than the coordination of the vast number of Federal programs with the thousands of units of local government.

Metrobank should be capitalized at a minimum of $6 billion—half to be borrowed from the U.S. Treasury over a 10-year period and the other half to be raised by the sale of stock in the commercial market. Each user would purchase shares of Metrobank stock based on population within its jurisdiction.

This capitalization would be the reserve. Then Metrobank would sell bonds to private investors, and the money raised would be available to communities at low interest rates, with the difference in interest rates subsidized by the Federal Government.

This not only would give local government a powerful new financial base, but also would allow Americans to invest in the rebuilding of their cities. I think many citizens are concerned enough about the future of our cities to invest in Metrobank.

There would be no ceiling on the amount of money to be raised. The needs are tremendous. A conservative estimate of the cost of replacing obsolete facilities and meeting the needs of an expanding population is $625 billion by 1975.

When you first look at it, it is a staggering figure. But placed alongside our gross national product, it represents less than 10 percent of the goods and services produced in the next six years.

What is more, it is money that will be invested in community and economic development. It is not like a welfare check that comes and goes. It is an investment in the life of a nation, in the health and vitality of a city, in the well-being of the people. What better investment is there than in schools, health facilities, housing, sanition, and economic development?

The America of the 1970s will require the same kind of coordination, commitment and management to modernize and rebuild our metropolitan areas as did the space program in the 1960s. Apollo 11 and the space program taught us that if we put ourselves to the task and establish a program of management to bring together both public and private resources, we can do what people over the years have said is impossible. We can do what we need to do.

Neither local taxes, nor the federal government, nor municipal bonds can meet this challenge alone. Metrobank would harness them all together.

Metrobank, chartered by act of Congress but not a federal agency, would serve all levels of government. There is good precedent. In this country we have had the Federal Land Bank, Production Credit Administration, the Bank for Cooperatives, and the Rural Electrification Administration. We also have invested in international banks such as the World Bank, Asian Development Bank, and Inter-American Development Bank—and all of them have worked.

Metrobank would allow cities to plan development programs and borrow money, knowing they have a solid financial base.

We must act. We're losing the race to save our cities. If we don't create a capital structure such as Metrobank, our metropolitan centers will have, along with rising building costs and interest rates, an explosion of frustration and alienation the like of which we have not foreseen.

TRUE TRANSPORT, INC.—A GOOD EXAMPLE OF "BLACK CAPITALISM"

Hon. PETER H. B. FRELINGHUYSEN

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Speaker, there has been considerable discussion regarding the responsiveness of Federal regulatory agencies and in particular the way in which the Interstate Commerce Commission discharges its responsibilities. I would like to call attention to a specific case involving the Commission in its handling of an application from a constituent.

Mr. Leamon McCoy, Jr., is the president of True Transport, Inc. He is a black entrepreneur and a resident of my congressional district. Mr. McCoy has had more than 20 years of experience in the trucking field. He formerly operated under another company's trucking authority but when this company went into bankruptcy Mr. McCoy conceived the idea of establishing a trucking firm that would deal exclusively in carrying containerized shipments. This mode of transportation involves the movement of material between the initial shipper and the consignee without opening the container regardless of whether the movement is by truck, rail, steamship, or any combination thereof.

With advice and help from the Office of Minority Business Enterprise of the U.S. Department of Commerce, and financial aid from the New York Urban Coalition, he founded True Transport and started operating last year. True Transport operates out of New Jersey's Edgewater waterfront. Apparently his is one of the first companies to specialize in the movement of containers. True Transport has found a great demand for its services in the Port of New York. When True Transport applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a 30-day temporary authority last year he was rebuffed by the local office of the Commission, presumably because of protests of other carriers who held conflicting authority.

Mr. McCoy then appealed directly to the ICC in Washington, on the basis that his service was different from that offered by ordinary truckers in that it was tailored to fit the peculiar needs of the container shippers. Mr. McCoy's shipper-customers, large and small, made known to the Commission their confidence in his ability. In addition, the Federal Maritime Commission, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Port of New York Authority, and again the Office of Minority Business Enterprise, supported his position. This time True Transport was granted a 180-day authority under which they are now working.

It is my hope that this temporary grant will ripen into permanent authority after hearings on the issue of full authority for the company. I believe the ICC is to be congratulated for recognizing the need for the service that True Transport offers and for granting the temporary authority. It indicates, in this case at least, that the Commission has not acted to stifle competition as has been charged in some areas.

I have inquired, and the Commission has informed me that it is a matter of record that during the past year 488 totally new motor carrier operating authorities were issued by the Commission. The ICC has indicated that the issue often is not whether competition can be broadened, but whether the venture can be profitably sustained.

It is evident from Mr. McCoy's experience that the concept of "black capitalism" is a valid one. The assistance he received from Office of Minority Business Enterprise, along with the objectivity displayed by the ICC, prove the Federal agencies can indeed be responsive to the people they serve.

FOOD COSTS

HON. JAMES M. COLLINS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, our Washington group of the Texas State Society had a luncheon. They flew all the food up from Texas on Braniff. We all thought the buffet was tremendous, but I was especially impressed with a written statement at each plate. It reminded us of the basic economics of food, and its relative cost in our living standards.

Review these facts summarized by C. G. Scruggs, editor, the Progressive Farmer, Southwest edition:

In 1900, every American family spent 40 percent of its disposable income on food. Today, the average family spends only 17 percent of its disposable income on food.

In the past 20 years, average farm prices have gone down 9 percent. Hourly earnings of manufacturing workers have gone up 127 percent. Corporate dividends have gone up 251 percent.

In 1920, it took 4 hours and 29 minutes of work to buy a pound of steak, a pound of pork, a quart of milk, a dozen eggs, a dozen oranges, and a 10-pound sack of potatoes.

Today, it requires only 1 hour and 30 minutes of work to purchase those same items—plus built-in maid service of frozen orange juice, frozen, ready-to-cook potatoes, and other conveniences of packaging. The remaining hours of work can be used to buy color TV's, boats, swimming pools, air conditioning, dishwashers, weekend cabins, and three-week vacations.

FEDERAL MARITIME COMMISSION

HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. GARMATZ. Mr. Speaker, because of recent and growing problems and conflicts in our foreign waterborne commerce to the possible detriment of our merchant fleet and foreign trade, and in view of the current study being given a program to revitalize our merchant marine industry, I bring to the attention of the Congress a speech recently made before the annual convention of the Movers and Warehousemen's Association of America by Commissioner George H. Hearn of the Federal Maritime Commission. Commissioner Hearn, in discussing the permissible scope of our regulation of our foreign waterborne commerce and the ways in which the FMC can protect our ocean trades from unfair practices especially as employed by foreign-flag carriers and their governments, answered unjustifiable criticisms of the FMC and U.S. regulatory policy by explaining the essential role played by the FMC in maritime affairs and the intention of the United States to promote world trade for the good of all nations. It is time for all participants in our foreign waterborne commerce to recognize the legitimacy and fairness of our regulatory role in ocean commerce and our intention to serve the best interests of international trade.

Commissioner Hearn's remarks follow:

REMARKS OF COMMISSIONER GEORGE H. HEARN OF THE FEDERAL MARITIME COMMISSION AT THE 35TH ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE MOVERS & WAREHOUSEMEN'S ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA, INC., ST. FRANCIS HOTEL, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, FRIDAY, MARCH 13, 1970

My topic today is one which I believe to be of great importance generally, and especially important to you gentlemen because you form a part of the large and complex entity usually called the merchant marine industry. Consequently, I speak to you not only in your capacity as movers and warehousemen, but in your role as participants in ocean-borne commerce—that vital aspect of our foreign trade.

The subject of my remarks is, broadly, the permissible scope of government regulation in maritime activities. More specifically, I will address myself to the question of "What the Federal Maritime Commission Can Do For You."

As you know, I am one of five members of the Federal Maritime Commission. And, incidentally, I bring the regards of all my fellow Commissioners, especially Chairman Bentley and Commissioner Day who would have liked to have accepted your invitation since they have not previously attended your convention. We constitute the leadership of one of the many independent regulatory agencies which form a part of our federal government. Such agencies are not part of any of the three primary branches of the government; but they are, rather, arms of the Congress, empowered to act within specific statutory frameworks and guided in their actions by principles of administrative law.

This brief description of the nature of the Federal Maritime Commission may seem somewhat complicated and erudite. However, I have offered that description because I wish you to understand one fundamental point: the members of the Federal Maritime Commission are not five people who sit behind closed doors rendering decisions and making rules by whim or fancy. We are, instead, at the same time: judges; regulators of certain aspects of the merchant marine industry; and, above all, guardians of a segment of the public interest. With such important duties entrusted to us, we Commissioners are compelled to act within our Congressionally established framework and within the bounds of administrative law principles. Consequently, we render decisions only on the record before us. We do not, however, hide our head in the sands, but we try to keep alert to events and trends throughout the maritime industry.

Therefore, as one who shares those responsibilities, I am greatly concerned when I read and hear unjustifiable attacks against the Federal Maritime Commission; and consider it one of my obligations to speak out in our defense.

I do not mean to indicate, however, that the Federal Maritime Commission should be immune from criticism, and when the critique is meaningful and constructive, I feel obligated to acknowledge it and act upon it. When, however, the critique becomes an attack which is off the mark I am duty-bound to respond. In fact, some recent remarks last October and last month directed at us from abroad are to what I would like to address myself.

It has become a habit, I think, for certain persons abroad, particularly Europeans, engaging in commercial endeavors, to gain esteem and popularity at home by lashing out publicly against the Federal Maritime Commission for allegedly interfering in and impeding international waterborne commerce. Typical of this position are some statements which emanated a few weeks ago from Europe as carried in a prominent and reputable trade journal. I shall rebut each charge reported, and, in so doing, attempt to construct a brief for the Federal Maritime Commission.

As I have said, the F.M.C. has been attacked from abroad for over-stepping the bounds of permissible national regulation in the area of international ocean commerce. It should be said, therefore, that it is true that among the maritime nations, the United States has the most comprehensive system of regulation over the many components of the merchant marine industry. This does not mean, however, that when it comes to ocean shipping, the United States is any more nationalistic or protective than most other nations. The maritime nations who do not engage in some sort of subsidization of their merchant marine are a scant few. It must be recognized that such subsidization can take many forms including flag discrimination, direct subsidies and tax preferences. A good example of such merchant marine nationalism is a lively issue today in the industry. That is the uninhibited efforts by almost all South American countries to severely restrict the participation in their trades by cross-traders or third-flag carriers, that is, carriers who fly the flag of neither the nation importing nor exporting the cargo being shipped. And of course you know that American ships engage in very little cross-trading. In such manner the South American countries hope to build their merchant fleets to the point where they can control a substantial portion of their ocean-trades and retain valuable currency reserves. This action has caused great concern not only in the United States but also in Europe.

There is more to be said on this matter, but for now I wish only to point out that the United States is not the only country which places conditions on participation in its ocean commerce. And I might add that the complaining foreign ship owners have continually profited well in our trades, and they have chosen, therefore, to shed crocodile tears rather than abandon our piers.

I return now to those allegations from our European friends.

It is said, first of all, that "The Federal Maritime Commission has long sought to impose on the carriers of American seaborne trade rules designed partly to promote America's overseas commerce . . ." The Federal Maritime Commission does not seek by rule or any other means to discriminate in favor of our foreign commerce. While we ensure fair dealing in our commerce and protect all participants therein regardless of flag, we are thereby promoting for the overall benefit of international trade. If this constitutes promotion of our overseas commerce, criticism of our actions is surely ill-conceived. What the gentleman from overseas apparently does not understand is the distinction between "promotion" and "protection".

As I have already said, virtually all of the world's maritime nations practice some type of subsidization of their merchant marine industry. And all nations, maritime or not, seek to promote their overseas commerce through rules, regulations, taxes and every manner of device designed to protect domestic industries in markets at home and abroad. That any nation, including the United States, may and actually does promote its merchant marine and its foreign trade can hardly be regarded as a sin. And for any public official to speak out on matters so important to our economy as the health of our merchant marine industry and foreign commerce, is not only commendable but also a responsibility of public office. This is especially true when the speaker is not only knowledgeable on the subjects but also closely connected with them. That an official is not directly or solely responsible for merchant marine or trade promotion should be no bar to his offering his advice through public utterances. So long as he practices within the bounds of his statutory responsibilities, a public official may preach according to his general expertise.

Today, however, I am dealing solely with the statutory activities of the Federal Maritime Commission and, therefore, I emphasize the fact that the promotional and regulatory aspects of our merchant marine policy are vested in two different agencies.

As you all know, the Federal Maritime Commission was created as an independent regulatory agency in 1961 when President Kennedy prepared Reorganization Plan No. 7, which Congress permitted to become effective. In transmitting the Plan to Congress President Kennedy said:

"The development and maintenance of a sound maritime industry require that the Federal Government carry out its dual responsibilities for regulation and promotion with equal vigor and effectiveness. . . . Recent findings by committees of the Congress disclose serious violations of maritime laws and point to the urgent need for a reorganization to vest in completely separate agencies a responsibility for (1) regulatory functions and (2) promotional and operating functions."

One of the Congressional committees referred to by the President was the House Judiciary Committee whose Chairman is the revered dean of the House of Representatives Congressman Emanuel Celler of Brooklyn. His Committee issued the famous "Celler Report" in 1962 following an extensive investigation into the conduct of our foreign waterborne commerce. One of the conclusions of the "Celler Committee" was that:

"The separation by Reorganization Plan No. 7 of 1961 of the regulatory functions . . . from the promotional aspects could . . . go far toward restoring the new Commission to its rightful position as an effective and meaningful independent regulatory agency."

It should be clear, therefore, that the unmistakable Presidential and Congressional mandate is for effective regulation by an independent regulatory body. And within that framework, the F.M.C. seeks to ensure that our merchant marine and that of every other nation trading in the foreign commerce of the United States are given fair and equal treatment in every respect from all quarters. In other words, the F.M.C. opposes unjust discriminations against all merchant fleets and all cargoes.

Thus we offer protection to all who participate in our foreign waterborne commerce, and not only to our own shippers and carriers. And it appears now that some of the foreign carriers who are so critical of the F.M.C.'s protectionist attitude could use such nondiscriminatory assistance in areas beyond the F.M.C.'s reach. For example, under our statutory authority, we can fight the type of flag discrimination which I have mentioned as a growing problem in the South American trades.

This is not a new problem, however, although its effects are very severe today because of the increased ability of South America and other developing nations to back up their words with deeds. These countries have now built, or bought or are building substantial merchant fleets.

The F.M.C. successfully dealt with such discrimination as early as 1964 when the United States was faced with practices on the part of a foreign government which discriminated against U.S. shipping lines. When negotiations failed to eliminate those practices, the F.M.C. issued an order under Section 19 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920. Under that section the F.M.C. is empowered to issue rules and regulations designed to offset such discriminations employed by foreign governments. Upon the issuance of that order the discriminations were removed and the Section 19 order never went into effect.

Now many countries have laws which by one device or another favor their own flag carriers and discriminate against all other flags, and particularly against the flags of cross-traders. At present the F.M.C. is trying to work out the problems those laws have created so as to protect the interests of all flag carriers in our trades and to ensure to shippers competitive conditions among those carriers.

So far the F.M.C. has succeeded in two instances in ameliorating the current difficult situation in South America. Last month the F.M.C. approved an equal access agreement between United States and Argentine carriers. That agreement permits those carriers to compete equally for the government sponsored or controlled cargo of the two countries in the United States/Argentina trade. Also last month a similar arrangement was worked out between U.S. and Peruvian carriers.

One of the thorniest problems currently before the F.M.C. is that involving the coffee and cocoa trade with Brazil. Negotiations have been going on for many months at governmental and commercial levels. Cargo pooling agreements for the carriage of the vital coffee and cocoa cargoes are currently pending action by the F.M.C. and I am limited, therefore, in what I can say on the matter.

I can say this much, however, concerning U.S./Brazil trade. The F.M.C. will, within the limits of its power and authority, prevent unjust discrimination of all kinds, regardless of the allegiance of the carrier or other party claiming harm. For proof of this one need look only to the famous NOPAL case (F.M.C. Docket No. 1096) decided by the F.M.C. in 1964. In that case we declined to approve a cargo pool which included U.S. carriers on the ground that it was unjustly discriminatory and unfair towards NOPAL, a Norwegian flag carrier.

Foreign carriers should welcome this type of assistance available to them at the Federal Maritime Commission, for I read only last month that certain of them are encountering problems with which the F.M.C. could help were they occurring within the foreign commerce of the United States. I am referring to a report from Germany that two conferences serving the Europe/South America trades will be dissolved on June 30, 1970 and that the European carriers involved are considering abandoning their operations in the trades. The report, as published in a trade journal, states that these eventualities are inevitable unless the "crass flag discrimination practiced by the Latin American countries is discontinued." The apparent lack of immediate and effective recourse open to the European carriers is emphasized by the following quotation from the trade journal:

"The European shiplines seem powerless to counter effectively this course of events. A passive policy with retortion measures is not a proper approach for arriving at a new shipping order . . . German ship operators hope that the Bonn government will finally depart from its policy of innocuous aide-memoires protesting against flag discrimination."

It would be nice if our foreign critics would sometimes couple their attacks with some acknowledgment of the benefits foreign carriers can derive from action by the Federal Maritime Commission.

The second charge made against the F.M.C. is that we have imposed rules on the participants in our ocean commerce "partly to protect some ill-defined form of public interest." The absurdity of that charge should be evident on its face; but at least the spokesman used "protect" and not "promote". In response it need only be asked what form of public interest is being protected by the action, or in-action, of the European governments in respect to the South American trades? And, further, it might be asked whose public interest was served when the West European carriers recently lost the coffee trade between the United Kingdom and East Africa?

When American shippers, carriers and markets are being squeezed, the foreign carriers cry "foul" as soon as the F.M.C. takes action. When rate disparities and surcharges inhibit the entry of American products into foreign markets, the foreign carriers vigorously oppose any responsive action by the F.M.C. I offer two quotations as examples of the public interest the F.M.C. protects. The first quotation, from the "Celler Report" which I have mentioned, says:

"It is obvious that the drafters of the [Shipping Act of 1916] contemplated that the [Commission] would act as a perpetual guardian of the sea lanes protecting shippers, merchants, and independent vessels alike from undue exercise of economic power by conference lines."

The second quotation is from a recent trade journal article reporting the fact that West European conference carriers had lost the East Africa coffee cargoes to East European lines. Members of the coffee importing trade stated that

"the conference service to London had been getting 'worse and worse'. [and that] the conference had been overcharging in the past . . . [The importers] were 'fed up' with being given rate increases by the conference and extra surcharges . . . without being able to negotiate. The tendency of the conference was to 'pontificate', but the deterioration of the service was a major reason . . ."

Other trade journal reports from Germany which appeared last year further emphasize the inconsistencies underlying the complaint that we protect an ill-defined public interest. Early last year a situation arose in which the German government decided to take action against a conference serving the Europe/Far East trades which included German carriers. The German government was disturbed by the fact that shippers were being unjustly penalized for not using conference vessels exclusively. German ship owners sharply criticized their government for jeopardizing the entire conference system. Shortly thereafter, however, the German carriers expressed their displeasure at their government's policy of non-interference in maritime affairs. The carriers were gravely concerned about the flag discrimination being employed by other countries. This leads me to wonder whether some people's definition of "public interest" does not depend on whose ox is being gored.

The record of the F.M.C. in protecting the public interest is clear and unquestionably reflects favorably on our activity. I have already discussed the manner in which the F.M.C. protects the public interest in nondiscriminatory treatment toward all carriers regardless of their flag and in avoiding international confrontations. But there are many more interests at stake as set forth in the Shipping Act of 1916. According to that Act the F.M.C. is obligated to prevent numerous anti-competitive practices, including the use of fighting ships, deferred rebates, retaliation or discrimination against shippers by means of rates or space accommodations, and inequitable treatment of ports, shippers, types of cargo, and independent lines. I am sure, therefore, you can appreciate that many segments of a nation's economy are affected by events in ocean commerce, and I will refrain from cataloguing them all. I will however, mention a few examples of F.M.C. protection of the public interest, leaving it to you to decide whether that public interest is really ill-defined, particularly from the point of view of the segment of the public directly concerned.

First there is the shipping public, and its members' chief interest is to be able to compete successfully in foreign markets. Consequently, shippers are concerned that they be treated in such a manner as not to be unduly prejudiced in the marketability of their products. Such prejudice can take many forms, but for our purposes I will limit myself to a discussion only of freight rate disparities and surcharges.

The F.M.C. began its general inquiry into freight rate disparities in 1963. Much congressional and other public concern was expressed at that time over the fact that American products were apparently paying higher rates outbound than similar foreign products were paying moving into this country. Despite fierce opposition from some participants in our foreign commerce—notably the conferences—the F.M.C. has finally succeeded in establishing a legal and, I think, effective means of eliminating rate disparities when they are unlawful. The effectiveness depends only on the F.M.C.'s exercise of its authority.

The F.M.C.'s investigation of disparities produced two initially important cases: Dockets Nos. 1114 and 1171, decided in December 1965 and May 1966. Although these cases did not find any rates to be unlawfully disparate, the F.M.C. did begin to set guidelines for the determination of unlawful disparities. The culmination of the F.M.C.'s efforts came with its decision in August 1968 in Docket 65–45.

In that case the F.M.C. found several rates in the eastbound North Atlantic trade to be unlawful because they were so unreasonably high as to be detrimental to the commerce of the United States. The F.M.C.'s decision rested in part on the fact that the rates being charged to American exporters were unjustifiably higher than comparable rates charged to foreigners exporting to the U.S. or comparable eastbound rates being charged to Canadian exporters.

The F.M.C.'s decision was upheld by the District of Columbia Court of Appeals. The Court specifically approved the F.M.C.'s conclusion that where disparities are unlawful on their face, the F.M.C. can require the carriers to justify the disparities; and if the justification is not established, the F.M.C. can order the rates lowered to a justifiable level. It is also interesting to note the final comment of the Court in response to the objections of the conferences to the F.M.C.'s action. The court was "inclined to think the Commission would have been hard put to fulfill its statutory duty with less disturbance of the traditional practices in the trade." As a result, conferences and carriers in our trades should be on notice that the Federal Maritime Commission is prepared to take all steps necessary to protect American shippers from unlawful predatory practices.

Surcharges might seem to be a rate category distinct from disparities; but at times the differences are illusory. The best example of this appeared last year following a longshoremen's strike which crippled our East and Gulf coasts. The strike ended in early 1969 and immediately almost all carriers and conferences serving our East and Gulf coastports imposed surcharges on goods moving through those ports.

This action, without more, would not have been too difficult to bear. After all, the F.M.C. does not seek to deprive carriers of fair compensation. Insofar as the effects of the strike required immediate recoupment of some losses by means of an equitable surcharge, the F.M.C. was not unyielding. Nonetheless, the surcharges were not in all cases imposed on an equitable basis. Many carriers and conferences imposed them only on cargo moving outbound from this county and not inbound.

The F.M.C. thought it clear that the effects of the strike had been felt equally by all shippers whether they sought to move goods into or out of the affected ports. Some carriers responded by removing the outbound surcharges, but others remained intransigent. They relented, however, when the F.M.C. took strong action. We ordered the carriers to show cause why their conference agreements should not be disapproved because through the use of disparite surcharges they operated in such a manner as to be detrimental to our commerce.

This matter did not end there, however, because the carriers and conferences quickly changed their surcharges into general rate increases, thereby delaying F.M.C. procedures. The F.M.C. has not given up, however, and we are still pursuing the matter of these increases. I believe that the carriers can designate a rate increase with any name they please, but they cannot oust the F.M.C. from its responsibility and authority. I believe further that the F.M.C. should not let its action in such matters lag lest the relevant facts disappear into the dim past.

I have already mentioned several times the efforts of governments to promote their merchant fleets. Related to that are the efforts of most nations also to seek control of the manner of shipment for government owned or sponsored cargo. Thus governments usually seek to retain currency reserves and save tax dollars by reserving a certain percentage of government cargo for national flag vessels. A nation's entire economy can benefit from such action. Whenever necessary, therefore, the F.M.C. ensures not only that our government is receiving equal treatment among shippers, but also that the government is not being taken advantage of just because it is the United States Federal Government.

In 1965 the Agency for International Development approached the F.M.C. with respect to extraordinary charges being assessed by carriers on shipments between the U.S. and Vietnam. AID thought the charges to be unreasonably high and sought the F.M.C.'s help in obtaining reductions. The F.M.C. consulted with the carriers and conferences involved and obtained relevant cost data from them. Analysis of the data indicated to the F.M.C. that the extra charges were unreasonably high. After further F.M.C. meetings with the carriers, the charges were voluntarily reduced, producing a long-run saving to our government of millions of dollars. Additionally, annual government savings of an estimated $3 million resulted from similar action taken by the F.M.C. in 1968. At that time, too, extra charges were imposed on cargoes moving to Vietnam, but through the efforts of the F.M.C. they were either reduced or eliminated.

From my discussion so far you might think that the only persons with maritime interests to be protected are those who deal with the carriage of freight. I am sure you are aware, however, of the large number of Americans every year who spend their vacations on cruises and ocean crossings. They too need protection, and the F.M.C., as always, stands ready and able to offer it.

The jurisdiction of the F.M.C. to protect ocean passengers is limited. We do exercise some surveillance over the conditions of passenger bookings and fares. The F.M.C. does have full responsibility, however, over a significant aspect of passenger operations. By virtue of Public Law 89–777 the F.M.C. requires almost all passenger vessel operators serving our ports to have available sufficient funds to cover two important eventualities. One is to reimburse passengers holding tickets for aborted voyages, and the other is to make compensation for death of or injury to passengers. The F.M.C. interpreted that public law as requiring more than the mere continuing availability of funds. We concluded that passenger travel would not be fully secured unless the available funds were at all times within the United States.

A great uproar arose among the passenger liner operators and foreign insurance interests when the F.M.C. announced this position. They claimed that the F.M.C. position was financially unbearable for the industry. We held firm, however, and recent events compel the conclusion that no such financial disaster was ever probable. Within the past few months the foreign insurance underwriters, with whom most marine insurance is written, have reorganized their assets located in this country, and the approval of the F.M.C. is required to ensure continued compliance with our passenger insurance rules. The insurance companies have said frankly that they desire to continue as the insurers under our rules, and, further, the funds or assets which they intend in any event to keep in the U.S. far exceed the sum which the F.M.C. requires. This evidences the type of cooperation that can exist between the F.M.C. and foreign maritime interests, and particularly between us and the European insurance underwriters.

I could continue longer on the subject of the varied and important role the F.M.C. plays in guarding our public interest. I think that by now, however, you understand what is meant by the public interest, and that while it may appear in many guises, it is certainly not indefinite. I feel certain, also, that you will agree when I say that the public interest is as worthy of protection in this country as it is anywhere else; and that when anyone tries to defeat our maritime connected public interest, the F.M.C. may take appropriate action. This is especially true when one considers that 95 percent of the ocean cargo of the U.S., the largest trading nation, is carried on foreign ships. We, therefore, have all the more reason to keep a watchful eye on our foreign commerce.

The third charge leveled at the F.M.C. from abroad is related to the subject I have just been discussing—that of calling into question our public interest. We are told that "curiously no objections seem to have been made to the absorption of American shipping companies by industrial conglomerates which might well be thought to endanger the public interest."

This in itself is a curious statement when the speaker has just criticized the F.M.C. for protecting an "ill-defined form of public interest." Aside from this, it seems to me rather inappropriate that a foreigner should be criticizing this government's exercise of its supervisory authority over domestic monopoly and anti-trust matters. The inaptness of the criticism is underscored by the inherent difference between the American attitude toward industrial monopoly and the one generally assumed in west European countries. At the risk of oversimplifying, I think I can safely state the difference as follows: United States economic philosophy favors the preservation of competition and views skeptically all actions which limit competition such as by reducing the number of competitors; other countries also favor competition, but their philosophies lean more toward permitting anticompetitive action and then deciding whether any unreasonable economic harm has resulted.

This distinction is certainly no more evident than in the field of ocean shipping. The United States has always assumed that the existence of shipping conferences constitutes a per se violation of our anti-trust philosophy. Other maritime countries place few restrictions on the operation of their merchant fleets and generally subscribe to a policy of laissez-faire.

The "Celler Report" which I have mentioned dealt specifically with this subject when it said

The Anti-trust Subcommittee recognizes the unique character of the ocean shipping industry with respect to the application of the anti-trust laws. No other governments inhibit their carriers by anti-trust laws, and American ocean carriers must compete, not within the framework of our domestic anti-trust laws, but in the jungle world of ocean shipping. The Alexander Committee [when drafting the Shipping Act of 1916] recognized this difficulty and granted a limited exemption to the industry from certain provisions of the anti-trust laws, conditioned upon submission to regulation by the . . . Federal Maritime Commission.

Consequently, the principles of anti-trust law are always present in the F.M.C.'s deliberations, and objections are usually raised by complainants, intervenors or the F.M.C. itself on matters pertaining to anti-trust issues. Nevertheless, the Federal Maritime Commission is not the agency of our government that exercises primary jurisdiction over the anti-trust laws. That task rests with the Department of Justice. As a result the F.M.C. can consider anti-trust issues only as they relate to matters within and persons subject to our jurisdiction. We must strike a balance by determining whether the public interest will be served by sanctioning an anti-competitive activity in the interests of good shipping practice, or by finding the anti-competitive activity too severe.

Where an industrial conglomerate acquires a shipping company, there is little the F.M.C. can do. We lack jurisdiction over the conglomerate which does not engage in any maritime activity. When, however, there are at least two parties to a corporate consolidation who are subject to our jurisdiction, the F.M.C. does act. The most important case in this area involved the proposed merger of three West Coast carriers in Docket No. 66–45. It took two decisions in that case, but the F.M.C. approved the merger after assuming jurisdiction over the merger agreement despite the strenuous objections of the parties. When the case was appealed to the courts, the F.M.C.'s assertion of jurisdiction was affirmed despite the intervention of the Department of Justice in opposition to the F.M.C.'s position.

Nevertheless, the Justice Department still retains full jurisdiction in cases such as the absorption of a shipping company by conglomerate corporations not subject to the jurisdiction of the F.M.C. However, once such absorptions are accomplished the F.M.C. gains jurisdiction over the conglomerate insofar as it engages in the activities of the absorbed shipping company. Thus, while the F.M.C. cannot pass on the question of whether the absorption serves the public interest, the F.M.C. can ensure that the consolidated companies continue to act in the public interest.

Illustrative of this authority is a case now pending before the F.M.C. The case involves a charter agreement between two of our largest containership operators who themselves are subsidiaries of conglomerate corporations. The F.M.C. could not have prevented the containership operators from being absorbed by the conglomerates, but having been accomplished we can ensure conglomerates do not abuse their position their position in the shipping industry by, in any way, acting contrary to the public interest.

The next charge fired at the F.M.C. from across the sea is hardly worth mentioning in view of what I have already said; but I will deal with it as it deserves. It was said that "Interference by governments could hinder the effectiveness of [our] shipping on the high seas [with] particular reference to the Federal Maritime Commission." I will be somewhat charitable and suggest that the speaker may have been misquoted in that he must have been aware of the recent actions taken by other governments against European ship operators. I speak, of course, about the East African coffee trade and the Europe/South American trade.

I challenge our critic to compare the effects of F.M.C. action and the action of other governments on the loss of cargo of European ship operators. Perhaps a more significant comparison would be between the actions taken by the F.M.C. to protect all flag carriers and the absence of action on the part of other governments to protect their "own".

The final charge made by our critic is that "unhappily legislation now before Congress would give the commission and perhaps other regulatory agencies new powers to control the terms on which American through traffic is carried within foreign countries." If this were true, I would readily admit that we were overstepping the permissable bounds of national legislation and regulation, but it is not true. At least I know of no legislation which would have the effect alleged.

It is well known, I think, that the most significant legislative proposal pending in Congress on this subject is the Trade Simplification Bill. I assume that this is the pending legislation which has struck fear into the heart of our foreign colleague. Such fear is not at all warranted. The transportation of goods in other countries is beyond our national jurisdiction. However, our government does have a legitimate interest in knowing the relationship between through routes or joint rates which include U.S. points and the carriers participating in such movements.

In other words, the United States exercises legitimate jurisdiction over ocean carriers participating in our foreign waterborne commerce. Consequently, our jurisdiction should not be disturbed because the participation of certain carriers in our ocean commerce may include transportation partially in a foreign country. When the carriers of any nationality enjoy the benefits of our laws and profit from our trades, those carriers must submit to the ultimate bounds of our jurisdiction.

The F.M.C. can act effectively only when it is in possession of all relevant information. Thus in order to effectively exercise surveillance over a carrier's operations between New York and Liverpool, we much know the terms under which that carrier is offering to transport cargo on a through service between New York and Birmingham via the port of Liverpool. That the F.M.C. does not have jurisdiction over all portions of a through route does not diminish the need of the F.M.C. for data concerning the entire through route in order to regulate those portions subject to our jurisdiction. Shippers are no longer interested in the rate offered between ports. It is the total door-to-door movement which concerns the shipper or consignee. The ability of the F.M.C. to protect such shippers, or other affected parties, requires an analysis of the relationship between the through route and the portions of it subject to the jurisdiction of the F.M.C. Without such complete information the F.M.C. cannot, for example, determine whether two shippers are being treated equally along the entire length of the through movement.

The F.M.C.'s interest is, of course, not confined to obtaining complete information. We also realize the importance of encouraging the implementation of through services and other improvements in shipping. And we do not wish to impose rules on such new services which are so burdensome as to make them unworkable. On the other hand, the F.M.C. also seeks flexibility on the part of the industry. For instance, conferences of carriers should not hinder the development of modern techniques by clinging to outmoded practices.

Unfortunately the F.M.C. has been presented with the unpleasant task of trying to break down some of the old practices which have inhibited the offering of and experimentation with new services. The famous Container Marine Lines case, or Docket No. 68–8, is the prime example of the F.M.C. being required to impel progress because of intransigence in the industry. In that case the F.M.C. was presented by Container Marine Lines with a tariff offering a through service between U.S. ports and points within the United Kingdom. Implementation of the tariff was vigorously opposed by the conference of which CML was a member. The gist of the opposition was that if the conference did not, could not, or would not offer such service, neither could a conference member do so and remain a member.

After the F.M.C. modified the tariff to make it acceptable, we approved its implementation. We also admonished the conference, and gave public notice that the F.M.C. would not tolerate such obstructionist activities. This matter is not yet settled, and the North Atlantic trade continues in turmoil for many reasons, not the least of which is the unwillingness of some carriers to enter the 1970's.

We have not, however, left the ball in their court. Since then we have sought to encourage through route and through rate movements in various ways. First we have entered a proceeding before the Interstate Commerce Commission in which the I.C.C. is considering a rule relating to the use of through rates. We offered our comments because the F.M.C. is the agency with particular knowledge in the area of ocean transportation which is the dominant part of most through movements. We are interested in giving the benefit of our views on any law or rule under consideration and affecting ocean transportation.

With the same basic intent the F.M.C. also intends to keep its house in order. We have, therefore, proposed a rule of our own which would set forth the requirements for filing through rates with the F.M.C. And in the spirit of cooperation, we are proposing no requirements on carriers subject to the F.M.C. which we did not include in suggestions we made concerning the I.C.C. rule. This F.M.C. rule-making proceeding is now ripe for decision and during the hiatus between the writing and delivery of these words our decision may be issued.

The F.M.C. has, however, rendered one other decision on this subject, in a case involving nine conferences serving the U.S./Latin America trades. The conferences sought approval of modifications of their agreements to permit them to negotiate with other carrier modes for establishing through routes and through rates. The F.M.C. granted the approval provided the conference produce some results within twelve months. After that time, if no results are evident, conference members may negotiate for their own account and, in effect, become quasi-independent carriers like CML.

I think it is fair to summarize the various criticisms which I have discussed as follows: United States regulatory policy toward its foreign oceanborne commerce is oppressive and discriminatory against foreigners who participate in it, and the Federal Maritime Commission implements that policy through the imposition of rules which are detrimental to the merchant fleets of other countries.

These allegations are not new. They have been repeated many times, and I and other members of the F.M.C. have frequently refuted them. Today I have presented a rebuttal in the broadest possible terms, covering as many of the responsibilities of the F.M.C. as possible. My remarks have been styled to try to lay to rest whatever veracity anyone might have credited to those who have sought to impugn the Federal Maritime Commission. I have attempted, also to indicate to our detractors the shortcomings of their criticisms. It is time, I believe, for the critics to acknowledge both the essential role played by the F.M.C. in maritime affairs and the need to continue the mandate for a separate and independent regulatory agency.

We do not seek a popularity award; we do not ask for applause from the foreign maritime industry; and we do not parade our accomplishments with bravado. However, we do expect, if not appreciation, at least recognition of the legitimacy and fairness of our regulatory role in ocean commerce and of our intention to serve the best interests of international trade. In fact, the Administration has said in proposed legislation "that it is the policy of the United States to facilitate the movement of freight in international commerce."

Thus, I think it is unseemly for foreign maritime interests to profit well from participation in our trades, for foreign carriers to continue to ply our trades despite our regulation, and for those carriers to be suffering severe hardship in other trades and still persist in mounting attacks against the Federal Maritime Commission and U.S. regulatory policy. Our critics are not the only ones wearing "white hats". The United States seeks only to promote international commerce for the good of all nations.

TRIBUTE TO CITY COMMISSIONER STANLEY W. EARL, OF PORTLAND, OREG.

HON. EDITH GREEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mrs. Green of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, the city of Portland this month has lost a strong fighter in the cause of good government, City Commissioner Stanley W. Earl. Commissioner Earl suffered a heart attack and died unexpectedly on March 4, 1970. The death of the 59-year-old commissioner has come as a severe blow to his associates and to his many friends and supporters in the city. He was an unusually forceful and independent man who acquired his place of leadership in the community through years of hard work and sacrifice in the Oregon labor movement. He was as dedicated a public servant as he was a tough-minded labor leader and negotiator in the years before he came to city hall.

In his 18 years on the city council, Commissioner Earl became chiefly responsible for the modernization of the Portland Fire Bureau. It was also through his efforts that the wages and hours for the Portland firemen were kept at a highly favorable level.

Commissioner Earl's independence, wit, and counsel will be sincerely missed.

I include copies of a recent editorial and article on Commissioner Earl which appeared in the Portland press:

[From the Oregonian, Mar. 6, 1970]

EARL WAS A FIGHTER

City Commissioner Stanley W. Earl, who died of a heart attack Wednesday at the age of 59, was a plain-spoken, stubbornly principled man whose independence on the City Council was a guarantee that machine politics would gain no lasting foothold in Portland city government.

His sometimes stormy career in organized labor and government earned him the respect and confidence not only of the working men whose battles he fought for so many years but of the business and professional community. It was not his custom to weasel in difficult decisions; he only spoke out when he thought it necessary, but when he did there was no question of where he stood. He made some enemies, but his friends were legion.

Our recollections of Stanley Earl go back to his leadership in the early days of the CIO, as he joined with others in routing—on at least one occasion with his fists—the efforts of pro-Communist radicals to gain control of the International Woodworkers of America. He was equally forthright after his services as a federal labor adviser in postwar Korea in denouncing the corruption of the Syngman Rhee government and the inadequacy of U.S. diplomats on the eve of the Korean War.

Commissioner Earl not only resisted but exposed certain efforts of underworld affiliates to clamp a vice and gambling dictatorship on the City of Portland. His material assistance to this newspaper in exposing a gambling-oriented conspiracy, as well as his own forthrightness, exposed him to smear campaigns which failed to damage his reputation or his popularity at the polls.

Mr. Earl served the city well for 17 years as commissioner, demonstrating administrative skill in improving and expanding the Fire Bureau and other agencies, and sound legislative judgment in a period when city needs far outpaced city revenues.

As was the case with the late William A. Bowes, another commissioner of notable independance and strong convictions, Mr. Earl's place may be filled by a younger man with fresh ideas. But his record in office will stand as a credit to him and to the no longer adequate form of commission government he served with diligence and integrity.

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Journal, Mar. 5, 1970]

COUNCILMAN EARL ROSE THROUGH RANKS OF LABOR

Stanley W. Earl, 59, a Portland native with a high school education who rose through the ranks of labor, then spent nearly a year in Korea on a federal assignment before the first of his five successive elections as a member of the Portland City Council, died Wednesday of a heart attack.

Currently in his 19th year as a city commissioner, Earl was at times an outspoken member of the council, was often at odds with some elements of labor including most recently the Portland Police Association and underwent some stormy years in his political career, particularly during the vice probes of the late 1950s.

First elected in 1952, and subsequently re-elected by Portland voters in 1956, 1960, 1964 and 1968, Earl lost a $250,000 libel suit against the Coos Bay (Times) World in 1958 over the newspaper's publication of two Drew Pearson columns which purported to link Earl with James B. (Big Jim) Elkins, former Portland underworld figure. Earl denied any close association with Elkins in the sensational trial at Coos Bay.

Born May 11, 1910 in Portland, Earl grew up in "Slabtown," Portland's Northwest district, attended Lincoln High School until he was 16, and then quit to become a candy-maker for a Portland biscuit factory.

Subsequently he worked for his father, Hugh Earl, as a grocery clerk, later as an insurance agent, member of a steel gang for Southern Pacific railroad, and then joined the Eastern-Western Lumber Co., as a lumber handler on the Portland docks in March, 1937.

At one time he held a $3-a-day job in a historic Chinese gambling emporium known as Hop Lee Tailor's, but he denied ever having anything to do with the gambling end of the establishment.

Soon after his entrance into lumber mill work Earl became active in Local No. 3, CIO Lumber and Sawmill Workers Union, and in 1940 was elected president. He subsequently resigned to become secretary of the union.

In 1943 Earl was elected secretary of the CIO Oregon State Industrial Union Council, a post he held until mid-1949 when he resigned to accept a federal appointment as the first ECA labor adviser to Korea.

During World War II Earl was a member of the U.S. War Manpower Commission for the West Coast and a member of the West Coast lumber commission division of the War Labor Board. In 1948 he was a member of the City Club's vice investigation committee.

Ten months after his arrivel in Korea, Earl and his wife and two children left Seoul shortly before its capture by the North Korean Army following the outbreak of the Korean war. His family escaped on a fertilizer boat bound for Japan where Earl joined them when he and other government officials were flown out of the city. The family lost most of its personal possessions in the flight from Korea.

Often outspoken during his earlier career as a labor official, Earl caused a considerable stir on his return here with his highly critical comments condemning the government of South Korea. He said that "corruption and graft characterized the Army, the police and the ministries of the South Korean government."

Earl was also highly critical of the work of various U.S. advisers to the Korean government and suggested a congressional investigation, claiming that some of our diplomats are "too much above the people."

After his return here, Earl served for more than a year as a special investigator for the income tax division of the Oregon State Tax Commission, to which he was appointed by Ray Smith, then head of the division.

Early in 1952 he filed for council position No. 1 then held by City Commissioner Fred L. Peterson, who subsequently filed for the post of mayor.

In his second year as a council member, Earl blasted his fellow commissioners for "abdicating their authority" and "lacking intestinal fortitude" in relation to an ordinance regarding salaries of city employes.

During his 1956 re-election campaign, Earl got into a verbal battle with Clyde Crosby, international representative in Oregon for the AFL-CIO teamsters when he accused Crosby of opposing him because he refused to bow to a "corrupt ultimatum" that he vote to legalize pinball machines. In the election the Portland Central Labor Council voted to endorse Earl's opponent, Jack O'Donnell.

Earl said Crosby had issued an ultimatum to him on May 18, 1955, to "support the Teamsters on the pinball issue or they would oppose me in the 1956 election."

The next day, Earl said, he voted against Crosby's request for a rehearing on pinballs, which Crosby wanted licensed by the city.

"I am confident the people of Portland will defeat the alliance of certain Teamster officials and slot machine-pinball people," Earl said.

In 1954 Earl had favored the licensing by Portland of pinball machines and had sought to introduce an ordinance to license them. He later explained his change of heart about pinball machines, which he said came while he listened to a housewife testify how her husband had "pinball fever" and had squandered more than $1,000 on the machines, forcing her to cut down on her grocery budget."

Earl had the endorsement of a number of other labor unions and a campaign committee which read like the who's who of Portland business in his 1956 campaign.

In the 1960 campaign which followed the Portland vice probes, Earl handily defeated a former city commissioner, J. E. (Jake) Bennett by a 8 to 5 margin, and after the election teed off against the "campaign of smear and smut in this city during the election." He cited in particular 40,000 pamphlets which had been distributed during the closing days of the campaign, which he described as a "smear" against "the mayor and myself."

Earl attributed the pamphlets to the Oregon Institute of Social Welfare, an organization which he had termed a "racket" in 1956. The organization's attorney and president in turn had threatened Earl with a $500,000 suit.

In 1963 Earl was highly critical of the city's Civil Defense program and he clashed with Mayor Schrunk. Earl maintained there is no defense to nuclear war other than prayer.

In recent years there have been fewer public outbursts by the sometimes stormy petrel of the city council. However, he recently asked to be removed from the city's negotiating team with the Portland Police Association in a heated statement.

Throughout his long career on the council Earl had the Fire Department under his jurisdiction and provided leadership in the major modernization program carried on in updating its equipment, station locations and communications. Four fire chiefs served under him, including Edward Grenfell, Hal Simpson, Dale Gilman, and James Riopelle.

Earl also had under his jurisdiction the bureaus of shops, buildings, communications and electronics, and nuisance abatement as well as supervision of City Hall and the office of probation and parole.

Divorced from his first wife in 1965, by whom he had three children, Earl is survived by his wife, Helen; two daughters, Mary Louise Seeburg and Sarah Wittren, and a son, Thomas Earl, all of Portland; his mother, Mrs. Bertha Earl, and a brother, Stewart Earl, both of Baker; a sister, Mrs. Mary Elgi of Caldwell, Idaho; a step-daughter, Mrs. Barbara Brown of Fall River Mills, Calif.; and two grandchildren.

Funeral arrangements are pending at J. P. Finley & Son.

CHILD-CARE TAX DEDUCTION

HON. MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mrs. GRIFFITHS. Mr. Speaker, at this time, I would like to insert into the RECORD a letter I received from a constituent in Detroit, who is a working mother supporting herself and her child. The point raised regarding the need for providing a tax deduction for child-care expenses is well to consider. The letter follows:

FEBRUARY 23, 1970.

Congresswoman MARTHA W. GRIFFITHS,
Longworth Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

I quote the following from "The View From My Window," which I received in last week's mail.

"The Tax Reform Act represents a substantial step forward in closing or narrowing tax loopholes, which have permitted billions of dollars to escape taxation, and in assuring a fairer tax structure for all persons."

I am the first to agree that billions of dollars have escaped taxation, and that there should be a fairer tax structure for all persons.

If I accepted your statement at its face value, it would give me, an individual, some slight hope. However, in preparing my income tax return for 1969, I encountered an item which I found to be grossly unfair to a working mother, which I understand has not been relieved in the Tax Reform Act.

I am a working mother. I have a 3½ year-old son. I am forced to work for the support of myself and my child, as my husband is imprisoned. (He went off his rocker, so to speak, last year and seriously wounded a policeman who had stopped him for a minor traffic violation.) After that incident, I moved from my home in Wisconsin to Detroit, Michigan where I could secure more gainful employment as a Secretary. I entered my son in a day nursery at a cost of $23.50 per week. I have to pay for child care, as I must work to support myself and son—I have no other income.

When I prepared my income tax return, I took the $600 exemption for child support, or rather, child care. The instructions provided that I should compute the exemption on a separate form. Upon working out the separate form, I found that if I made over $6,000 per year, I had to exclude the portion over $6,000 in wages from the $600 child-care exemption. First of all, I paid out more than $600 per year for child care. Secondly, I made over $6,000 and had to deduct the excess over $6,000 from the $600 exemption allowed.

This is a gross injustice to women who are forced to be the major breadwinner in the home. I would like to point out that I did not seek aid or public support of any sort. I immediately set out to take care of me and mine. The injustice—as I see it—occurs in the fact that business and industry are permitted to exclude expenditures from taxation which they consider "expenses of making a profit," such as country club dues, The Detroit Athletic Club dues, the Recess Club dues, and expenditures for theatre tickets, gifts, etc., automobiles for personal use, gasoline, and all other fringe benefits and entertainment expenses they can charge to company credit cards and write off as "business expenses."

However, when reviewing the item of child care expenses to the working mother, it is an absolutely necessary expense of earning a wage. Without nursery school (or some similar service) I would not be able to work and earn a wage, thereby becoming another number on the welfare rolls. However, the government sees fit to exclude a portion of child care payments because I make over $6,000 per year, and by not allowing the entire expenditure for child care—which is greater than the $600 exemption.

Why then, isn't there a ceiling on the amount of deductions a company can declare as expenses in making a profit. I have worked for many businesses—both large and small—and I have observed this flagrant misuse of exemptions and deductions allowed by the government to the businessman. In one case, a person who works in the main office of a company is given a company car which is never used for business, as he works in the office 100% of his work day. Yet, the car, taxes, insurance, license plates and gasoline as well as maintenance expenses are all charged off as a company expense.

I believe that any mother who is forced to work to support her child should be given the benefit of a direct expense (in total) to earning that support. In this case, it is the total amount of child care necessarily expended in order to be gainfully employed. It should be expensed just as a salesman expenses his car and mileage in the pursuit of sales, or just as a grocer expenses his utilities and the rent and other direct costs of making a sale.

Can you, Mrs. Griffiths, see the injustice in this matter and work toward seeing that it is corrected through proper legislation?

I would appreciate your views on the subject.

Very truly yours,

——— ———.

MAPLEWOOD, NEW JERSEY, ONE OF THE FINEST CITIES IN THE UNITED STATES

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, I should like to call to the attention of my colleagues the recent honor accorded to Maplewood Township, N.J., which I have the honor of representing in the House.

Maplewood was awarded a certificate proclaiming it one of the 22 finest cities in the United States in the All America Cities competition, which was sponsored by Look magazine.

H. Bruce Mershon, president of the Maplewood Jaycees, revealed that Maplewood was the only city in the Northeast United States to receive such recognition in the competition. The city originally participated in the event at the urging of the Jaycees.

Maplewood's mayor, Robert Grasmere, said that he felt all along that Maplewood deserved such recognition. I wholeheartedly agree.

Congratulations, Maplewood Township, on your well deserved honor.

WISCONSIN CIVILIAN IN VIETNAM REPORTS VIETNAMIZATION IS WORKING

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a former president of the Fond du Lac, Wis., common council, who has been working in Vietnam since April 1968, returned for a brief visit this past week and reported that he is greatly encouraged by progress in the Vietnam pacification program. Mr. James Megellas heads one of the four area pacification programs in Vietnam.

An article describing the major progress being made under present U.S. policy appeared in the March 16 issue of the Fond du Lac Commonwealth Reporter.

For the benefit of my colleagues I insert the full text of the article at this point:

Says James Megellas: The United States on Right Track with Vietnam Policy

By STAN GORES
(Special Projects Editor)

"I think we're on the right track and the policy we're pursuing is working."

That brief, but hopeful, summation of the puzzling war in Vietnam was given this morning by James Megellas, currently winding up two years of agenc: field service for the State Department and who less than a decade ago was devoting his time to local problems as president of Fond du Lac's common council.

"I'm confident that with our present program," Megellas commented in an interview, "and reducing the level of our combat forces, as President Nixon has been doing, that we'll progress to the point where the Vietnamese will be able to take over the actual fighting of the war.

RECENT BIRTHDAY

"But how long we'll be there is not for me to say," he continued. "I'm just there doing a job for the government and I'm encouraged with the progress."

Megellas, who last week observed his 53rd birthday, will leave Fond du Lac Tuesday and be in Manila in the Philippines on Thursday with his wife, the former Carole Laehn and his two sons, James and Stephen. Next Monday morning he'll fly to Saigon and "back to my job."

Mrs. Megellas and the children have been living in a suburb of Manial since her husband took over his Vietnam assignment on July 3, 1968. He has been able to visit his family regularly, and occasionally Mrs. Megellas has toured Vietnamese hamlets and villages with her husband.

Since June of 1962, Megellas has been a representative of the Agency for International Development. His first assignment took him to Yemen for two years, followed by four years in Panama.

RETURN TO CITY

He'll wind up his present duties when he and his family sail from Manila for San Francisco on May 25. They expect to arrive in Fond du Lac by June 12. He'll then await another overseas assignment and, from what he learned last week in Washington, D.C., it will be a tour of duty which will permit him to be with his wife and children.

Megellas is greatly encouraged by signs of progress in the Vietnam pacification program. This project, basically, covers two fields: (1) Establishing village and hamlet security; and (2) Assisting in political and social development.

In striving toward these objectives he has been head of the Civil Operations and Revolutionary Development Support (CORDS) effort in Vietnam's II Corps Tractical Zone. He has not worn a military uniform, but has held a rank equivalent to a major general while taking part in high level briefings and Vietnam appraisal conferences.

So his knowledge of Vietnam, and the U.S. situation there, is considerable. Last week he addressed State Department representatives at a briefing in Washington in which he declared that "pacification, in the long run, is what will put Vietnam back on her feet as a free, viable, and self-sufficient nation . . ."

The corps area Megellas has headed is one of four in the country, but encompasses 48 per cent of the geography. When he went to Vietnam in April 1968 to look over the situation prior to his assignment, he found that "less than 50 per cent of the hamlets were under government control."

The figure for determining how much of the territory could be classified as under control, be explained, is based upon figures from a computer.

MAJOR PROGRESS

"In February of this year," he continued, "90 per cent of the area is under government control."

This, of course, represents major progress.

"We now have 93,000 regional forces and popular force soldiers in our corps alone," he said. "Last year we organized the peoples' self defense forces, and there are about 400,000 in this, including all able bodied men above and below draft age, and also women. A total of 85,000 of these people are armed with weapons."

President Thieu of South Vietnam has frequently called the conflict a "people's war," and he has worked to arm the Vietnamese and work toward desired goals, Megellas remarked.

"Last year we held democratic elections in the hamlets and villages and 95 per cent of the people in my corps area now have elected officials," he explained. "All of these elected officials were flown to a training center south of Saigon for six weeks and President Thieu spoke personally to each member of the graduating class."

Another phase of the pacification program directed by Megellas, one of World War II's most decorated soldiers, was a financial aid project. Each village in his corps received approximately $9,000 for self-help objectives, with the people deciding how they could best use the money.

The outcome resulted in new water wells, schools, health centers, roads and similar projects. This effort did much to establish the identity between the government and the people, said Megellas.

MUST WIN PEOPLE

Asked if he could cite a single incident in which the money was not used wisely, Megellas said he couldn't. He emphasized that such a program is crucial to the goal of free government in Vietnam, and commented, "If we defeated the Communist military forces and yet didn't win the people we'd lose the war."

Megellas believes that the Communists no longer believe they can win a military victory in Vietnam.

"Captured documents have shown they've changed their tune," he said. "They now see it as a prolonged war."

Do the Vietnamese people really care what kind of government they have?

Megellas is convinced they do. They show it, he says, by their willingness to become elected leaders. Accepting such a position makes them prime assassination targets for the Viet Cong.

The alleged My Lai "massacre" incident played up so widely in the United States, is not a major issue among the people of Vietnam, according to Megellas.

"I've never heard the Vietnamese raise this issue in my area," he commented. "It has never been discussed with me by the Vietnamese. I simply haven't heard much about it over there—even among the Americans."

ENEMY DETERIORATED

Megellas firmly believes the United States policy is effective, even though he admits "what the ultimate end will be I don't know." His job hasn't been to make foreign policy decisions, however. It has been to get to know the problems of the Vietnamese people by living and working among them, and helping them to sound, free government and an improved economy.

"And they're much stronger now than they were," he concluded, "while the enemy's strength has deteriorated and their influence over the people has lessened. I definitely think we're on the right track."

While in Fond Du Lac Megellas has been staying at the home of his mother, 222 Third St., and also has visited at the home of his wife's parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Laehn, 4112 Lakeshore Dr.

THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES B. UTT

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, March 23, 1970

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my colleagues in the House in expressing my sorrow at the death of Jimmy Utt, a respected and well liked Member of this body for the last 17 years. Jimmy combined a warm, gentle nature with a fierce dedication to principle and duty. As a high ranking member of the Ways and Means Committee he carried out his assignments on that vital committee with a vigor and industry dictated and based on the best interests of his country. In the mundane atmosphere of a national legislative body his religious convictions remained an integral part of his motivations. A man of the West, Jimmy Utt was born and lived in his beloved Orange County and was a successful businessman and State legislator before coming to Washington. That Jimmy served his people well is attested to by his 9 terms in Congress, a wholehearted endorsement from his constituents of the 35th District of California.

The Honorable James B. Utt has gone back to the West but he has left memories of his charity, integrity, and dedication for us to emulate.

I extend my sympathy to his surviving family who, I know, are sustained in the knowledge that he has done his job well.

VFW VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNING ESSAY

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. TEAGUE of Texas. Mr. Speaker, each year the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States sponsors a voice of Democracy program in which high school students are asked to write a broadcast script. All five winners of this year's contest on "Freedom's Challenge" were guests of honor at the VFW congressional dinner and received a personal congratulation from President Nixon. I would like to include the essay of the second place winner, Dennis DiMarzio of Sycamore, Ill. An 18-year-old Sycamore High School student, Dennis is president of the student council, drum major of the band, and vice president of Thespians. He also is a member of the National Honor Society, an Illinois State Scholar, and has won letters in baseball and basketball. Dennis plans to study law at Northern Illinois University. The VFW should be commended for their sponsorship of such a fine program. After reading this essay, I think you will agree that we all can take pride in the patriotism and faith in America displayed by this young man.

The essay follows:

SECOND PLACE: FREEDOM'S CHALLENGE

(By Dennis DiMarzio)

The other day when I was in a rather philosophical mood, my mind wandered way back to a day when I was in the first grade. On this particular day, the teacher went around the room and asked each one of us what we wanted to be when we grew up. There was the usual number of cowboys, fireman, and baseball players, but at least half of us shrugged our shoulders and answered, I don't know. In high school, many students would answer I'm not sure. To me, this is the beauty of freedom, to have a choice, a freedom to be or not to be, to be what we want to be and not what we don't want to be. Now this does not mean that there are not limitations upon our aspirations, but it does mean that the government will not stand in our way, but that it will encourage us to pursue happiness and will aid us whenever it can. The limitations to our pursuit of happiness are within ourselves and the talents which have been granted us by a divine being.

If we become afraid to try or if we become frustrated to the point of giving up, then we have failed to meet freedom's challenge. If, however, we put our faith in ourselves and not in the opportunities offered by our free country, then we are meeting freedom's challenge.

So I believe then that I as a citizen can meet freedom's challenge by putting faith in myself and my country and by developing myself into the most productive citizen which my God given talents allow me to be.

This being the case, then how does the nation itself meet freedom's challenge? I think the answer to this question is deceptively simple. The nation can meet freedom's challenge in much the same way that the individual citizen does. It must put faith in itself and its principles and must strive to develop into the most productive nation which its God granted resources will allow it to be and just as the individual citizen must not be governed by fear, neither must the nation. It must not allow threats or predictions of failure to prevent it from taking those actions which it perceives to be right and just. In a similar way, our country like the citizens who live in it, must not give in to frustration, however great this frustration might be.

In carrying this comparison between the United States and the individual citizen a bit further, let us look at a situation which is much too common in our modern world. A citizen is walking down the street and sees an old man being beaten and robbed by three strong assailants. The citizen would have to overcome great fear if he were to aid the old man, yet he knows that this is what should be done. If he is to meet freedom's challenge, he must not give in to fear by looking the other way and pretending he didn't see. For when this is done, no choice has been made, fear has become his dictator. In a similar fashion, our nation must base its actions not on fear, but on a sense of righteousness. A few years ago, we witnessed a poor and weak South Viet Nam being beaten and robbed of its freedom by three assailants, North Viet Nam, assisted by China and Russia. But we met freedom's challenge and we are meeting it today, because we did not look the other way; we did not give in to fear. We knew what was right and we moved to help South Viet Nam defend itself.

Today, our nation is experiencing the same pain and frustration which our citizen on the sidewalk would experience in fighting the three assailants. Our Nation is suffering from a loss of blood, the blood of its young men, and it is suffering from the frustrating bruises inflicted not by the three assailants, but by some of its own citizens, and this time I use the term loosely, most of whom have allowed fear to dictate them. They would prefer to look the other way from Viet Nam, or more exactly, they want to run away from it. Fortunately, this form of opposition, frustrating as it might be, is for the most part characterized by weak fear driven individuals who hide under the guise of intellectualism.

Today, so that she might more rapidly overcome the hindrances presented by those dissenters who are unprincipled, the United States of America is making Freedom's Challenge her challenge to us her true and loyal citizens. But this is not the first time that freedom's challenge has taken this form. She challenged us at Concord, at Gettysburg, in the fox holes in Germany, on the beach of Normandy, and on the barren hills of Korea. Now she challenges us in the swamps of Viet Nam and on the issue of Righteousness versus Fear. She challenges those of us who are loyal to America to stand up and express our views more energetically and more sincerely than the loudest and longest haired of these unprincipled dissenters. We have the freedom to be a strong and righteous nation which has made the most of its God given resources and we have the freedom not to be a weak and unprincipled nation whose dictator is fear. This is Freedom's Challenge.

TASK FORCE HEARINGS

HON. GEORGE BUSH

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. BUSH. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Task Force on Earth Resources and Population of which I am chairman, has been conducting hearings on the mineral shortage problem for the past few months. Last year, we concentrated the bulk of our efforts on the examination of population growth. These hearings eventually led to the publication of our family planning report, "Federal Government Family Planning Programs—Domestic and International," on December 22, 1969. In order to keep continuity with last year's work, and because we feel that the population explosion is the cause of many other problems, we are attempting to relate our mineral shortage research closely with the population problem.

On March 18, it was our great privilege to have Dr. Jack Lippes, medical director of the Planned Parenthood Center of Buffalo, N.Y.; and Dr. Raymond Ewell, vice president for research, State University of New York at Buffalo. With very lucid and succinct testimony, Dr. Lippes and Dr. Ewell presented to the task force a wealth of useful information on the population problem and its effects. For the benefit of my colleagues, I have included Dr. Lippes' statement, and a paper by Dr. Ewell on the social, economic and political consequences of the high rate of population growth:

POPULATION DIMENSION—SOME RECOMMENDATIONS

Congressman Bush, and members of the task force: I am Dr. Jack Lippes, Associate Professor at SUNYAB in OB-GYN and Medical Director of the Planned Parenthood Center of Buffalo, New York.

The need for family planning is now so widely acknowledged, so obvious and so necessary to humanity that to dwell on this urgency would be superfluous. Instead the time has come for a deeper understanding and action.

The population problem in the U.S. can be better understood by realizing that the affluent and the underprivileged require different approaches to their excessive fertility. Within each of these two distinct economic groups are two sub-groups:

1. Those with unplanned and unwanted excessive fertility and

2. Those whose excessive fertility is deliberate.

Amongst the considered solutions for deliberate excessive fertility are:

1. Education which should include a study of the benefits of spacing children, not only to the mother, but to the child as well. A discussion of the advantages of a small family should be included.

2. Idealization of the small family. All media—T.V., newspapers, periodicals and radio should be utilized.

3. Legal devices—

(a) Raising the legal age of marriage.

(b) Financial incentives for the small family and penalties for excessive fertility. This could be mediated through the income tax laws.

Solutions to unplanned and unwanted excessive fertility must also include:

1. Readily available contraceptive services and abortion which for the affluent can be acquired from private medical sources, but for the underprivileged must be subsidized. Both male and female sterilization procedures should be more readily available. Many urologists in the U.S. are reluctant to perform male sterilization because they fear prosecution under their state laws for violation of maiming statutes.

2. Education—which I would like to take up in greater detail later.

3. For the underprivileged, readily available contraception and abortion means government sponsored or subsidized service. Even sterilization procedures would and should be government subsidized for the economically deprived.

Should we direct more of our efforts at the underprivileged? The U.S. Census Bureau has noted that the poor, those on welfare and those with incomes of less than $3000 per year, do have larger families than the average, affluent, suburban American. Yet such families number 5.4 million, perhaps 15% of American households. Obviously this 15% are not having 3½ million babies every year. The truth is that the bulk of this baby production comes from suburban America. Efforts to promote family planning must be directed at both the affluent and the poor. This is complicated by the moral and political problems of convincing people to accept abortion for unplanned and unwanted pregnancies and the sociologic problem of preventing deliberate high fertility. Too many American families are choosing to have 3 or 4 children, instead of 2 or 3. How do we convince American couples to choose smaller families?

If we are going to offer contraceptive services to the poor, it cannot be the singular effort to lower the American birth rate, nor should it be considered a solution to the high costs of welfare. It should be provided to the underprivileged in the name of justice and equality because for so long these underprivileged citizens have been denied the choice of deciding when to have a child and the choice of how many to have. This choice for the most part has been available to other Americans. Recent surveys asking mothers, "Did you plan, and/or did you want your last child?" have revealed that out of 3½ million births, 750,000 were unplanned or unwanted. Since every drug store is a source of contraceptive supplies, it is difficult to understand why we should have an excess fertility. What do we need to do to convert desire into reality and reduce the birth rate?

More and better education will help. Many school systems in the country have embarked on programs of "sex education". These have aroused much controversy, perhaps because of the label.

Last year the State of New York called a meeting of school teachers to be held in western New York. The purpose of this meeting was to indoctrinate the teachers in the latest knowledge relating to family life and covering material on reproduction, contraception, sociology, dating, mating and family life relationships. Over 400 teachers from every school district in New York State attended. The Planned Parenthood Center of Buffalo was invited to participate in the development of the program.

This conference represented a rare opportunity to find out how qualified these teachers were in family life education. Did they have reservations regarding sex education? How comfortable were they in discussing human sexuality? Were the teachers themselves inhibited in any way? How knowledgeable were these pedagogues in the subject they were about to teach? The responses or lack of responses to the questionnaire were revealing Only 53 of over 400 teachers cooperated by filling out the questionnaire. The lack of response was predicated on a negative attitude. Some arose in the conference and asked indignantly, "How dare those people from Planned Parenthood ask such questions?" "Who do the people at Planned Parenthood think they are?"

Of the 53 teachers who did respond, one-half were not knowledgeable of basic facts in the subject of reproduction. Many revealed that they had punitive attitudes in regard to social pathology such as homosexuality and out-of-wedlock pregnancy.

How can we expect the populace at large to be knowledgeable and tolerant if the teachers themselves are not only ignorant of the subject, but even profess negative attitudes and hostility in regard to some of the material which ought to be taught. What saddens one even more is how few teachers' colleges have undertaken programs to develop instructors who will be both knowledgeable and comfortable with this subject. There are some exceptions such as the course at the University of Minnesota under Dr. Gerald Neubeck, the one at the University of Houston given by Dr. Leslie McCary and one at SUNYAB. There are others. Perhaps if we begin to train teachers in family life, health education may make a meaningful contribution to family planning and stabilization of the American population.

I do believe that Congress could make funds available, perhaps on a matching grant basis with each state in order to develop a number of family life educators.

National television has not been utilized as it could be to acquaint the public with all the facts of the population problem. Fully exploited, national television could have an effect that would surprise demographers. Imagine a series of 1 hour television teach-ins, covering the U.S. population problem, the advantages of child spacing, idealizing the small family and ending with an up-to-date review of contraceptive technology. First, perhaps, the president of the U.S. could endorse the teach-in. Such a program or series of programs could have an immeasurably beneficial effect in reducing the birth rate.

Yet something would still be wrong, at least for families living in poverty. While talking to core area families, I am impressed that they are aware of the advantages of family planning. They know that in families of 4 or more children, the educational and economic opportunities are more restricted. Controlling family size to provide a higher quality life for the family is based on the assumption that opportunities to rise out of poverty are wide-spread. If this could become a fact, then it can be expected that most families will control their size, because it is in their own personal self-interest. If opportunities for escaping poverty are not available, there will be little motivation to control family size because it won't make any difference. Basically, these core area patients ask, "Is there any common sense in accepting the restrictions of middle class disciplines such as birth control, without receiving the rewards of a middle class life?"

One could go into the core area of American cities and provide everyone with birth control services. A program of not just sex education but compensatory education of all types could be instituted. Let us suppose that we could do these things to the point where every family is knowledgeable about birth control and everyone in the core area is so well educated that they all have Ph. D. degrees. Even then, someone has to come up a loser. They all can't be winners. Under our present competitive economic system the winner takes all and the loser gets nothing, except on the professional athletic field. On the athletic field, we Americans think differently. For example, professional football * * *. But the losers are also compensated with perhaps 40% of the gate. This is a contract which we Americans consider fair and equitable. It is a good instinct for fair play and justice. How relevant and satisfying it was to read in the New York Times (of February 19, 1970) that the House Ways & Means Committee approved the thrust of President Nixon's welfare reforms to provide a minimum annual income for working families This bill, if passed, will do more than permit poor families to rise out of the culture of poverty. It will reunite separated and abandoned underprivileged families. The increased income will, for the first time, allow such families to live in dignity. Family planning will then become the middle class discipline rewarded by the middle class life.

Information which could be included in a family life education program would cover new contraceptive technology. One would mention the fact that medicine already has a "morning after pill." Drugs, like Stilbestrol or Ethinyl Estradiol, taken in correct doses will prevent pregnancy if taken within 24 or 48 hours after intercourse. This is a fact and yet very few Americans are aware of it. The big drawback for general use, is that this medication frequently produces nausea and emesis. Still it could be used in individual cases. After all, the motivation to prevent pregnancy is greatest the morning after sexual intercourse.

This brings one to the even more controversial, but important subject of abortion. Statistics from eastern Europe show us that abortions done in a hospital under 12 weeks is a safe surgical procedure, with a mortality of 3 in 100,000 cases. Such surgery requires a short hospitalization, perhaps only one day. It can even be done as a hospital out-patient procedure. Countries, such as Japan and Hungary, have relied on abortion as a means of stabilizing population. These countries have two of the lowest population growth rates.

The new technique of suction curettage wherein the products of conception are removed through a hollow curette with a small amount of suction, has made the procedure both safer and easier. It has reduced blood loss. The whole procedure can be done in 5 to 10 minutes. With multiparous women, that is women who have had children, the procedure can be done under local anesthesia. This technique, if readily available as a solution to contraceptive failures, could make all contraceptive methods 100 percent effective. One cannot overemphasize the importance of abortion. It is still not generally available either nationally nor internationally. Yet, it must be. After all, we have plenty of preconceptual techniques—rhythm, pills, diaphragms, IUDs, condoms, jellies, suppositories. At the moment, we must rely on surgical abortion to back up these techniques.

What we really need is a cheap, safe and effective pharmacologic abortifacient. Here is where research funds should be expended and talent recruited. We should try to find a drug which would produce a safe abortion within the first 8 to 10 weeks of gestation. Such a drug would have a remarkable impact in lowering the birthrate on a world wide basis. The time to make such research funds available is now. The time for recruitment is now. It should be advertised and offered to every university or medical school which might be interested.

Obviously, the use of abortion to lower birth rates will require changes in legislation so that it is available on demand. Changes in public attitude and acceptance is also necessary. As Dr. Christopher Tietze said, "History shows, that man does possess the ability to change his beliefs in order to meet his necessities."

Another technical development is the laparoscope. This is an instrument with which a surgeon can look into the abdomen through a puncture. The instrument is less than ½ inch in diameter. Yet through this instrument a woman can be sterilized by electrically cauterizing the fallopian tubes. The procedure requires a general anesthetic. It can be completed in 15 to 20 minutes and the patient is released the same day. These instruments are expensive. A setup would cost about $1,500. American capital could provide the instruments in many areas where such sterilization programs would be undertaken.

Intrauterine contraceptive devices, IUDs, have proven to be the mainstay of successful population control programs in countries such as South Korea and Taiwan. Improvements are being made in IUDs. Newer clinical research suggests that the addition of elemental copper or zinc to an IUD, may make it 100% effective. The zinc may even quiet the uterus and reduce removals because of cramps or bleeding which in the past has been the major drawback to wider use of intrauterine contraception. The newer loop made of polypropylene has reduced spontaneous expulsions from 7.7% to 3.5%. Pregnancies or failures with the new polypropylene device have been reduced from 2.8 per hundred women per year to 0.5 pregnancies per hundred women per year.

The success of oral contraceptives need not be documented here because so much has already been written on this subject. Everyone is aware of their use and that they have lowered the birth rate for many countries in western society. This oral medication has been too expensive for developing countries. The rate of discontinuance so far has been too high for successful use. In the future, similar drugs may be placed in a plastic capsule and then inserted under the skin. Enough of the drug will reach out to prevent pregnancy for long periods of time. The period of protection will depend on the size of the capsule and the amount of the drug.

All of these techniques could be used in developing countries just as well as in the United States. Because of cultural, economic and educational differences, the mix of the various methods will be different. The big problem in Asia as in the United States is the sociologic one of convincing people to have smaller families. Developing countries in addition, have the problem of continuous supply, availability of services and surveillance of masses of people. In Asia a large family, especially having many sons, becomes the parent's social security. It is the son who will care for mother and father in old age. One way to promote family planning in such countries is by government promising social security. An Asian government could promise all young couples that if they limit their families to 2 or 3 children the government will provide social security when the parents are 65. Granted, that Asian countries do not have the capital to provide this now. But this is a promise being made to 20 year old couples, a promise to be fulfilled in 40 or 45 years. Either such a country develops in 40 years and has the capital to provide social security or in 40 years it will cease to exist. Other legal devices could be used: e.g. raising the legal age of marriage, removing income tax deductions for dependents after the second child. However, the U.S. government cannot write the laws of foreign countries. We can only act as advisors. We can provide technical help and sometimes capital where expensive equipment is needed to provide certain birth control services. The final decision will rest not with governments, but with people.

THE SOCIAL, ECONOMIC AND POLITICAL CONSEQUENCES OF HIGH RATES OF POPULATION GROWTH IN THE UNITED STATES AND OTHER COUNTRIES

THE UNITED STATES

1. The United States rate of population growth has declined from 1.6 percent per year in 1960 to 1.0 percent per year in 1968.

2. However, this is still too high a rate of growth to permit the United States to maintain its present high standard of living for many more years in view of the diminishing quantity and quality of our country's resources.

3. New and improved technologies can compensate partially for diminishing resources but not entirely. In spite of new and improved technologies, the standard of living in the United States may well begin to decline within the next 25 years.

4. The social and political problems which would be engendered by a gradually declining standard of living can be imagined.

5. Countries with more favorable ratios of natural resources to population than ours may surpass the United States in standard of living during the next few decades, notably Canada, Australia and the Soviet Union.

6. The United States should adopt a national goal of reducing the population growth rate to zero at the earliest possible date, the earlier the better. Only in this way can a standard of living, at least as high as ours today, be guaranteed for our grandchildren.

7. However, there are social and political ill-effects of a continued high population growth rate which are of even greater importance than the problem of maintaining a high material standard of living. Social problems of overcrowdedness, friction between people, mental illness, racial problems, urban deterioration, environmental contamination will all be exacerbated by an increasing population, and these problems will inevitably require a larger and larger proportion of the national income to effect even temporary solutions and palliatives.

THE LESS DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

1. Most of the less developed countries have much higher population growth rates than the United States. Most of the less developed countries have growth rates in the range of 2.0% to 3.5%, although there are a few lower and a few higher than this range.

2. Most of the less developed countries therefore have social, economic and political problems resulting from high population growth rates which are even more acute and more difficult of solution than those facing the United States.

3. The less developed countries as a group have a population growth rate of probably 2.6% per year which will, if continued, increase the population of the less developed countries from 2.7 billion in 1970 to 3.5 billion in 1980 while the population of the developed countries as a whole is increasing only from 900 million to 1 billion.

4. As one example, Mexico has a population growth rate of 3.5% per year which, if continued, would double the population in 20 years. This means Mexico's population may go from 50 million in 1970 to 100 million in 1990. If this really happens, as seems highly probable at this time, Mexico will have to double everything in the country in 20 years—food production, industrial production, housing, schools, medical facilities, transportation, etc., as well as provide many millions of new jobs.

5. Among the many problems facing the less developed countries food supply is one of the most pressing and most difficult of solution. The average rate of growth of food production in the world and in the less developed countries, too, has been slightly over 1% per year for a number of decades, say since 1900. This has resulted in a slow decline in domestic food production per capita in most of the less developed countries since 1950 so that these countries have been forced to import more and more food just to stay even.

NATIONAL RECOGNITION TO CITY LEGISLATOR

HON. ALPHONZO BELL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. BELL of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege today to give national recognition to a richly deserving city legislator from my home district in Los Angeles.

Robert M. Wilkinson, city councilman from Los Angeles' 12th district, represents the fastest growing area of the fastest growing city in the Nation. The 12th district is composed of the northwest land mass in the great San Fernando Valley. Its 49 square miles is made up of a population of 208,000. And it continues to develop with the passing of each year. This kind of development can and has produced prodigious growing pains.

All phases of city services must be expanded to meet the continual growth. Fortunately, the citizens of the 12th district have as their elected representative, a man who recognizes the requirements and needs of the community.

Councilman Wilkinson, dedicated to active public service, has moved the 12th district ahead in building more major public project improvements, providing additional police and fire services, augmented traffic facilities, providing consistently improved library and recreation and park services.

He sits in with the designers from State division of highways for the planning of three major freeways through the 12th district. He attends regular meetings of the State water resources board currently working on the Castaic Lake Reservoir, a major link in California's Feather River Aqueduct system. And he meets with contractors and developers in an effort to encourage the building of homes in the 12th district to alleviate the serious housing shortages.

During a major brush fire last year in the hill communities of the 12th district, Councilman Wilkinson arrived on the scene with the fire departments. Campus disorder at San Fernando Valley State College 2 years ago found him meeting with the academic community in an effort toward solving the problems.

Councilman Wilkinson's continuous struggle against smut and pornography mail-order houses led to the closing of two such businesses and the rescinding of post office box numbers.

Legislative action initiated by him this year formulated more stringent requirements for the issuance of police permits for rock music festivals within the city. This action came after some 200,000 young people converged on a portion of the district for 3 riotous days in the summer of 1969.

In addition to large issues, Councilman Wilkinson is concerned about the small problems, too, such as traffic lights and crosswalks for schoolchildren, noise abatement, zoning issues, and even the the sweeping of streets.

The way Councilman Wilkinson solves his many problems is the same method adopted by many other successful men—hard work. Hard work every day in the week; often including weekends.

Wilkinson, an oldtimer by most standards in the valley—having graduated from Canoga Park High School—is a relatively young man, married, and the father of three children, and grandfather to two granddaughters.

I am glad to relate that he is a fellow Republican and is serving his second 4-year term as a councilman.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues my sincere regard for the outstanding character and ability of Councilman Robert Melvin Wilkinson.

GOOD CHOICE FOR SELECTIVE SERVICE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. STEIGER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the new head of Selective Service, Dr. Curtis W. Tarr, has been widely hailed in Wisconsin newspapers. While Dr. Tarr takes on a difficult task, he is eminently qualified to undertake this most important post.

During his service in Wisconsin as president of Lawrence University, he also served as head of the Tarr Task Force charged by Governor Knowles with the responsibility of recommending changes in Wisconsin's tax distribution system.

The Appleton Post Crescent on March 15, the Sheboygan Press on March 14, and the Oshkosh Daily Northwestern on March 21, all praised Dr. Tarr's appointment. As one who is proud of this recognition of Dr. Tarr's ability and integrity, I want to call to the attention of colleagues the high regard of people in Wisconsin for Dr. Tarr. I include the editorials at this point:

CURTIS TARR WILL DO A GOOD JOB

It took a personal appeal from President Nixon to persuade Curtis Tarr to accept the position as Selective Service director, and we can appreciate Dr. Tarr's reluctance to take on this difficult task, but in the final analysis, there could be no better man we can think of for the job.

There is one vital element which must be given top consideration in the further reform of the Selective Service system, or its complete replacement by a professional military, and that is the vastly changed thinking of many of our young people toward military service to their country.

Basically it is the Vietnam war which has motivated this change in thinking, a war which lacks the support of, we believe, a majority of the American people. But there is no question that patriotism and duty mean something different to the adolescent generation of today than those words meant one generation ago.

Dr. Tarr, from his experience as president of Lawrence University, certainly understands the thinking of young people, even if he doesn't have to agree with it.

He has other outstanding qualifications for the position, experience and proven ability as an administrator, an ability to organize his thinking logically and efficiently and to express those thoughts in concise terms. More recently he has had an indoctrination in the military manpower requirements of the nation in his position as assistant secretary of the Air Force specializing in manpower affairs.

It was reported that Dr. Tarr's reluctance to accept the position when he originally was sounded out about it last December was based on two considerations, that the position was a controversial one and that it was a dead-end as far as a political career is concerned.

Knowing Dr. Tarr so well, we cannot believe that he would sidestep a controversial task. And if he can help the Nixon Administration to formulate a new military procurement policy for this country over the next few years it could well be a great boost for an even more important career in government. The fact that Gen. Lewis Hershey made a lifetime career out of the job doesn't have to influence Dr. Tarr, and we are certain that it will not.

A GOOD CHOICE

The nomination of Dr. Curtis Tarr, former president of Appelton's Lawrence University, to be director of Selective Service, should win the speedy approval of the Senate.

Dr. Tarr is presently a member of the administration, serving as assistant secretary of the Air Force, being responsible for manpower and reserves and thus has gone through the approval routine once. His background of college teaching and administration should make him highly acceptable to the leadership of higher education of the nation. His recent close and successful relationships with the draft age youth at Appleton should give him an added insight in the carrying out of his new duties. His own military service is a valuable asset.

But especially it seems to us, Dr. Tarr brings to the post a lot of imagination, courage and administrative know-how. President Nixon is anxious to have a volunteer army as soon as feasible, keeping Selective Service as an emergency device, at best. Dr. Tarr, as an educational administrator and as chairman of the well known Tarr Task Force studying Wisconsin's problems, demonstrated an ability and a willingness to strike off in new directions. So it would seem that if Selective Service is to be modified, carried on or completely abolished, Curtis Tarr would be a fine man to have in charge.

GOOD CHOICE TO HEAD DRAFT

A big chore for Curtis W Tarr, former president of Lawrence University, Appleton, as national draft director—in addition to administering the Selective Service law—will be to help to persuade Congress to initiate long-delayed hearings on further draft reform.

What will come from such hearings? Most likely the need for changes including the elimination of educational and occupational deferments and the establishment of new standards of classifying young men for induction.

President Nixon has attempted to persuade Congress to hold hearings on draft reform and may accomplish this end through his nominee for national draft director.

Tarr has firm credentials for the position. He was drafted for service in World War II and so is not unacquainted with the business of the "Greetings from the President." He was a combat GI and later a Stanford University scholar before being president of Lawrence.

His record indicates that he occupies the middle ground which is essential to compromising the sometimes explosive national debate over the draft. He has a sensitivity to youthful concerns over the draft, yet is candid in asserting that although he went into the Army with some "uncertainties . . . I realize now how important the experience is and was . . ."

As a civilian, and a man of apparent good sense, Tarr is a good choice for the director of the draft.

COINS OF INTRINSIC VALUE

HON. JAMES A. McCLURE

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. Speaker, the desire for coins of intrinsic value does not rest exclusively within the free world. East Germany, for example, has issued two new silver coins, one of 10-mark denomination and one of 20-mark denomination.

The 20-mark coin commemorates the 220th anniversay of the birth of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. The 10-mark coin honors Johann Friederich Bottger on the 250th anniversary of his death.

I am also advised that the United Arab Republic will be issuing a commemorative coin this year marking the 1,000th anniversary of the Al-Azhar mosque in Cairo. The Egyptian Government plans to issue 200,000 of these coins, each of which has a face value equivalent of $2.30 in United States currency.

THE PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

HON. HOWARD W. ROBISON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. ROBISON. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a thoughtful and timely letter from the master of the Horseheads Grange, H. Leon Van Gorder. The Horseheads New York Grange is in my congressional district, and Mr. Van Gorder was thoughtful enough to send me the text of its letter to a local television station. The letter comments on the efforts of some to discontinue the pledge of allegiance and salute to the American flag in the schools around this country. My personal feeling is that such efforts are misguided at best. Respect for country is as valuable for a child as respect for church and for family; and there seems to me to be no justification for driving patriotism out of our schools. Because I think the text of Mr. Van Gorder's letter to me should be shared with all Members of Congress, I am submitting most of the text for their information:

MARCH 4, 1970.

Hon. HOWARD W. ROBISON,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: On January 27, 1970, the New York Daily News carried an article stating that [some persons] wanted to discontinue the pledge of allegiance and salute to the American Flag in all the public schools. A short time later one of our local television stations carried a similar story pertaining to it, on the news cast.

As Master of Horseheads Grange 1118, Horseheads, New York, I talked with the manager of this television station and, also, the manager of one of our local radio stations. They both gave the Grange the full support of their stations for the stand the Grange took on the pledge of allegiance continuance. I, therefore, wrote to State Senator William T. Smith and Assemblyman L. Richard Marshall describing the Grange's feelings. While talking to the manager of the television station, he invited me to read our letter over the air for a local news cast. I have had wonderful response from it, and I should like to give you the text of it.

It has come to our attention that some people in New York State want the children in our schools to discontinue the practice of saluting the American Flag and giving the Pledge of Allegiance. By order of the Supreme Court, the Bible has been cast out of the schools, and now some want the American Flag and what it stands for taken out.

It is a shame that two of the most vital principles on which our Country was founded are now being frowned upon. So, we of Horseheads Grange 1118 want to go on record as supporting Governor Rockefeller and others interested in keeping the salute and Pledge of Allegiance to our Flag in the class-rooms of our schools.

After a conversation with Mr. Donald Buies, Manager of WSYE–TV, and Mr. Robert Chalk, Manager of WELM–radio, we are very happy to say both stations have given us their support in backing our efforts in this matter.

Trusting you will carry our message to the New York State legislators, I remain

Very truly yours,

H. LEON VAN GORDER,
Master.

CALIFORNIA'S SCIENTISTS AND ENGINEERS SPEAK OUT ON ECONOMIC CONVERSION

HON. CHARLES H. WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, March 24, 1970

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, the resolution establishing the California Legislature Joint Legislative Committee on Economic Conversion states that changing military needs have had, and will continue to have an adverse effect on the State's economy. Consequently, efforts have been urged to plan ahead to minimize the impact on local communities and the State as a whole during conversion from military to a largely civilian oriented economy.

As Robert M. Leventhal, executive secretary of the Southern California Professional Engineering Association, pointed out in testimony before the committee:

It is the engineers and scientists who have given our country its unequaled productive and technical capacity.

The significance of the Federal Government's involvement in engineering employment comes into focus from figures recently published by the Aerospace Industries Association of America and other concerned parties. These figures show that aerospace employs about 27 percent of the Nation's engineers and scientists and is the Nation's single largest employer of research and development engineers and scientists. Over 40 percent of the Nation's 1.3 million aerospace workers are in California and that the seven southernmost counties account for 80 percent of the State's aerospace employment. This percent translates into 350,000 jobs and a $3.5 billion annual payroll.

A direct result of losing a large Government contract for aerospace firms is mass layoffs. These layoffs have been occurring quite frequently in California. When President Nixon took office in January 1969, the unemployment rate was 3.3 percent. For the first quarter of 1970, it is calculated that the rate was 4.2 percent. Projections for the end of 1970 indicate that we will be faced with a 5.1 percent rate of unemployment at that time. In human terms, this means that over 1,250,000 people have lost their jobs and have been added to the roles of the unemployed since Mr. Nixon took office.

In discussing what steps should be taken to meet this rising rate of unemployment, Mr. Leventhal made many worthwhile suggestions. Accordingly, I am including into the RECORD, the text of his statement before the joint committee. Among other things, Mr. Leventhal feels the Federal Government should assume responsibility for its cancellation actions, with the Manned Orbiting Laboratory being his prime example and;

First. Grant each employee laid off at least 4 weeks pay.

Second. Cover the costs of employee group insurance for at least 6 months or until reemployment.

Third. Establish provisions to insure that funds contributed to retirement plans inure to the benefit of the individual.

Fourth. Establish or participate with State governments in establishing relocation allowances.

I now include into the RECORD for my colleagues' information, the full text of Mr. Leventhal's testimony. It is worth reading.

The material follows:

TESTIMONY OF ROBERT M. LEVENTHAL BEFORE THE CALIFORNIA LEGISLATURE JOINT LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON ECONOMIC CONVERSION

Prior to testifying before your honorable committee I feel it proper to place my comments in perspective. I appear before you as an advocate on behalf of the employed engineers and scientists. Currently I hold two organizational roles: Chairman of the Western section of the Council of Engineers and Scientists Organizations. The Council is a confederation of independent organizations representing almost 100,000 employed engineers and scientists. The Western Section represents over 50,000, the majority of whom are employed in California.

Secondly, I am the Executive Secretary of the Southern California Professional Engineering Association which represents the engineers and scientists at McDonnell Douglas in collective bargaining.

I also appear before you as a citizen concerned over human values and proper economic planning for our State.

The resolution establishing your committee sets forth, as one of its reasons for being, that changing military needs have had, and will continue to have an adverse effect on California's economy. Therefore, efforts should be made to plan ahead to minimize the impact on local communities and the State as a whole during conversion from military to a largely civilian oriented economy.

Since it is the engineers and scientists who have given our country its unequalled productive and technical capacity, I feel we should place the magnitude of the problem facing California engineers and scientists in perspective. Recent Bureau of Labor Statistics place the number of engineers and scientists in the work force at 1,013,100. The total national work force now stands at 82.5 million.

If we accept the Bureau's definition of an engineer, a matter the professional societies have and continue to debate, we see that these men, the innovators in our society, represent less than 1.2 percent of the National work force.

In the main, the engineers and scientists working in the aerospace industry have devoted at least 5 years to acquiring specialized advanced education. Many state governments, like California, have likewise made substantial investments in these men through tax support of institutions of higher learning.

It has been the foreign policy of this country to maintain so effective a deterrent force that no other nation would consider initiating hostilities. It should be kept in mind who designs, maintains and updates that deterrent capability—the employed engineers and scientists.

If we fail to properly plan for and utilize the skill and abilities of this critical segment of our work force, the consequences can be frightening.

The significance of the Federal Government's involvement in engineering employment comes into focus from figures recently published by the Aerospace Industries Association of America. Their survey covered 50 companies representing, according to AIA, approximately 80 percent of the total employment in the aerospace industry. Review of the companies that participated in the survey show they were the major contractors, therefore the data published by the AIA excludes the subcontracting firms so numerous in defense related work.

The AIA divided their material into geographical religions. The Pacific area included California, Washington, Oregon, Alaska and Hawaii. While no figures on California alone were given, it may be readily estimated that over 80 percent of the Pacific region represented California employment.

According to the AIA the percent distribution of Missiles and Space employment for Engineers and Scientists in the United States as of December 1969 for the Pacific region was 71.4 percent out of an estimated 214,000.

Mr. Atwood, President of North American Rockwell, in an address before the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce October 29, 1969, noted that aerospace employs about 27 percent of the nation's engineers and scientists and it is the nation's single largest employer of research and development engineers and scientists. He further noted that of the some 1.3 million aerospace workers, over 40 percent worked in California. The seven southernmost counties account for 80 percent of California aerospace employment—over 350,000 jobs, $3.5 billion in annual payroll.

Currently we are allowing the labor market to control utilization of engineers and scientists. Generally this is acceptable, but in the case of engineers and scientists there is the one large consumer, and I submit that consumer activities in the labor market create an intolerable instability.

Instability due to government procurement practices has already had a profound effect. I have read with interest an article by Mr. Berkley on the Myth of War Profiteering published in the December 20, 1969 issue of the New Republic.

Mr. Berkley concludes that the level of profit from defense work, measured as a percent of gross sales is very unattractive. The Logistics Management Institute published a study in 1969 showing the average profit margin for all U.S. Industry was 8.7% of sales, but that the average profit margin on defense work was 4.2%. Since the defense work was included in the overall figure, the disparity is even greater than appears.

Based on the figures presented in that article it is easy to see why greater emphasis is being placed by the major companies on non-defense oriented business. In 1968, private business accounted for 47% at McDonnell Douglas. By the start of 1969 commercial orders represented 68%. This is further illustrated by the heavy emphasis of McDonnell Douglas, Boeing, and Lockheed on commercial aviation, by L.T.V. entry into such ventures as steel and automated traffic systems; and by United Aircraft Sikorsky Division into experimental Turbo Trans and AVCO into finance and insurance.

While the low profit has certainly not driven these major companies out of the defense field, it has compelled them to re-direct some of their effort. During this redirection, it is my opinion that substantial trauma has occurred within our technical work force. The changes that could be handled, albeit rather poorly, by a free labor market institution, are over. What is left now is a hard core that is not readily convertible. How we employ these remaining men will have a substantial impact on the entire scientific and engineering community. We must have some thoughtful advance planning as the trend of reduced federal spending is clear.

It is all well and good for my learned colleagues in the field of economics to speak of short and long term displacement. I would like them to sit at my desk and face engineers and scientists who have been dumped unceremoniously on the street after ten to fifteen years on government programs and explain that while we knew this was coming we did nothing about it but that in the long run it will be in the national interest. That explanation won't pay the unemployed engineer's bills, feed his family or keep him in the engineering field; nor does it encourage him to have his son enter the field.

Recently we haven't been treating our engineers and scientists well. It's hard to identify a direct result of this development, but I find the following of interest. Mr. Edward Jacunski, Assistant Dean of the University of Florida notes that while the demand for engineers is growing, the supply is diminishing, if engineering school enrollments are an indication. Freshman engineer enrollments slipped from 23% to 14% between 1957 and 1969. Many engineering schools are reported to be begging for students.

My work requires that I come in contact with large groups of engineers. Often these groups are hostile because the engineering profession is divided over the issue of whether or not they should engage in collective bargaining. Regardless of the nature of the audience there appears to be a consensus that the engineers are not being well treated. When asked if they would encourage their sons to enter the engineering field, the answer is an overwhelming no.

An overview of what is happening to the engineer in the market place, particularly in the defense related field, gives an indication of why the engineering profession is upset.

Dr. Loomba at the Center for Interdisciplinary Studies at San Jose State College studied re-employment and unemployment experiences of scientists and engineers laid off from 62 aerospace and electronics firms in the San Francisco Bay area during 1963–65.

Those layoffs studied were triggered by cancellation of some major defense contracts. California suffered more severely than the rest of the country. In California defense companies, 26,400 workers were laid off.

Dr. Loomba zeroed in on the experience of the engineers and scientists caught in that layoff. After a careful study of some 1,184 who were compared to 30,000 who were not laid off, he concluded:

"The single criterion on which the population of laid off engineers and scientists differs from the population of working engineers and scientists is their age. Defense-oriented firms in the San Francisco Bay Area appear to have laid off workers primarily on the basis of their age. When education background, technical publications, patents, membership in professional societies, and number of engineering and scientific courses completed are considered there is no statistically significant difference between laid off and working engineers and scientists. Moreover, the older respondents completed relatively more additional technical courses since their last degree or diploma. Therefore, skill obsolescence appears not to have been a criterion for layoff."

As to the experience of the group for re-employment, "The median period of unemployment for engineers and scientists who were laid off in the San Francisco Bay Area is 12 weeks; six percent of respondents remained unemployed for one year or longer.

"Age appears to be the most significant determining factor as far as length of unemployment is concerned. However, the influence of age on the duration of unemployment decreases with the increase in the degree level. When respondents with Master's degrees are considered separately, pre-layoff salary seems to be the most significant factor. Individuals who earned lower salaries remained unemployed for longer period of time. In the case of B.S. degree holders and non-degree subjects, age is the most important factor for predicting the period of unemployment. The older the person, the longer the duration of unemployment."

For most engineers laid off, studied by Dr. Loomba, over 50% got less than two weeks notice, many were terminated in a matter of hours. They were laid off in large numbers, thereby flooding the market and making re-employment difficult if not impossible.

Let me attempt to put the economic magnitude of the group studied by Dr. Loomba into some perspective.

Assuming a median income of only $7,000.00 per year for these 26,400 workers, and with that income a 100% propensity to consume. The ripple effect on loss of earnings in local areas has been measured and the direct and indirect economic effect approaches a multiplier factor of three. We can conclude, based on these assumptions that for each month these employees remained out of work, the lost economic activity to the San Francisco Bay could be calculated as follows:

$$\frac{(26{,}400 \times 7{,}000)\,(3)}{12} = $42{,}200{,}000.00$$

Most of you are aware that in mid-1969 it was learned through a casual radio announcement that the Manned Orbital Laboratory was terminated. I do not know how many people were thrown out of work on this one project. Our records show more than 2,000 engineers and scientists at McDonnell Douglas alone were affected. Since the M.O.L. termination, North American's failure to win the F–15 competition, and other setbacks to local firms have caused many thousands more engineers to be laid off.

We have some interesting figures on General Dynamics-Kearney Mesa plant, San Diego. The engineers there have shown an interest in being represented. We have records on the size of that engineering force for past years. In 1963, about 4,000, just under 2,000 in 1965, and under 800 in 1969.

The majority of the engineers laid off from McDonnell Douglas were employed at the Huntington Beach facility, a large number resided in Westminster and Huntington Beach.

Since these are relatively small communities, the impact of lost economic activity of just the engineering payroll is significant.

Using the criteria previously discussed, with no consideration of the large blue collar layoffs, the lost economic activity just from the engineers could be calculated as follows:

Average monthly income — $1,200.00

$($1{,}200.00 \times 2{,}000)\,(3) = $7{,}200{,}000.00$

Regretfully no study of the magnitude of Dr. Loomba's has been done on these most recent layoffs. Your committee staff did contact our organization and request cooperation in surveying who got laid off and what their experiences have been to date.

We agreed to participate to the best of our ability in the hope that perhaps we might find some clues as to how to plan. In the study that is currently underway, cooperation was received from four organizations. Much of the data comes from McDonnell Douglas where the majority of the affected engineers were employed and good records existed.

In early August, about five weeks after the majority of the engineers and scientists affected by the M.O.L. termination had been laid off, a 21 question survey was sent by mail to some 459 potential respondents. While the vast majority were ex-employees of McDonnell Douglas, there were some from Lockheed, who were laid off as a result of the Cheyenne helicopter cancellation, and some from both General Dynamics and North American who had lost their jobs due to the general decline in those companies which has been going on for some time.

Considering that a mail survey was used, the response, 61%, must be considered excellent.

I should like to cover some of the highlights of the preliminary findings. Since we sent out a followup questionnaire in mid-November, the study cannot be completed until all the results are tabulated. I know your staff will transmit the final report as soon as possible.

By the time the questionnaires were returned, late August—early September, 75.9% were still laid off and seeking other employment, 23.9% had found other employment. Over 65% of those laid off had less than 10 years service. 38% reported that they had been laid off at least once prior to this most recent layoff and when asked whether or not they had lost pension benefits when laid off, a majority answered in the affirmative.

Question 20 asked, if they had any children, would they encourage them to consider engineering and science, especially as it relates to the defense oriented work as a profession. 14.6% said yes, 82.2% said no.

Currently some special analysis is under way on the McDonnell Douglas engineers as considerable data exists in the SCPEA files. It is of great interest that currently the average age of the remaining engineers at the company's Huntington Beach facility, from which the majority were laid off, is 37. The questionnaire grouped the respondents; 20–30, 31–40, 41–50, 51 and over. Of those responding, 49.3% were 41 and older, making the average age of those laid off higher than those retained.

When this study is complete, we have reason to believe the findings will not differ in any significant factor from what Dr. Loomba found. There is little to differentiate between those laid off and those retained except age. These are not superannuated employees, but men in their early 40's, who should be reaching toward the peak of a profession.

Over the years a body of programs commonly referred to as the fringe benefits has emerged. These fringes now represent a significant percent of payroll costs. Analyzing what is happening to the engineers and scientists during these cycles of federal spending leaves the uneasy feeling that these fringe benefit programs, which are designed to give the employee a degree of security are not only failing to do their job, but contributing to the industry's instability.

Few members of management have ever spoken candidly in print as to what happens and what criteria other than ability come into play when a company is faced with layoff. A recent article by Charles E. Durham, published in Astronautics Magazine for December 1969, states the case with unusual candor.

Mr. Durham notes that those who are close to vesting in the retirement plan seem to get laid off out of their relative proportion to the work force. While Mr. Durham does not make any outright accusations, the facts he sets forth speak for themselves. A 30 year old man hired at $15,000.00 per year shows on the hiring proposal at $570.00 for the company contribution to the retirement plan. A 55 year old man on the same terms, shows a $4,560.00 company contribution. The conclusion when layoffs are pending is self-evident.

Mr. Durham further comments that the company-paid portion of the pension ranging from $6,000.00 to $50,000.00 cash, depending on the age of the employee reverts to the credit of the company, reducing contributions in that fiscal year. There are no prohibitions from the Internal Revenue service or Armed Service Procurement Regulations prohibiting the company from receiving the benefit of terminations and cancellations in the form of reductions in future payments to tax qualified funded plans.

The net result of all this is while the company never gets a direct refund, the funds released from the accounts of the laid off employees becomes a credit against the company's obligation to contribute in future years.

I feel the problem is not confined to just the pension plans, though that one factor seems to have a significant impact on selection for layoff. The costs of health and life insurance programs are a function of average age. For large companies, the difference between an average age of 37 and 38 can be a significant cost factor.

It is ironic to note that so many of the programs devised to give employees a measure of economic security fail when they are most needed.

The majority of such programs contemplate continued employment. When layoffs occur all sorts of problems develop; health insurance coverage usually lapses upon termination of employment, or some time soon after. If the employee is re-employed with some other employer, usually there is at least a 30 day waiting period before he or his dependents are again covered. In many cases an exclusion from benefits for conditions that existed or were under treatment just prior to re-employment exists. Hence the individual, once laid off, is subjected to severe economic burdens which he is ill-equipped to handle.

In my some ten years of direct labor relations experience I cannot recount to you how often debilitating illness strikes soon after layoff. It seems the trauma of job loss and the uncertainty of income has an adverse affect on many—and it hits just when they can least afford medical care and then at a time when their insurance has lapsed.

In California all group life insurance contracts contain conversion privileges for those who leave the group. While this appears to give the laid off employee some chance to continue his life insurance, it is misleading. The conversion privileges are into some form of whole life offered by the carrier, the most expensive forms of life insurance written. To the man who has just lost his job, who has reduced earnings, and whose family is in need of more, not less coverage, this is indeed a cruel blow.

Most companies with termination pay provisions also have exclusions which lay down that where layoff is caused by termination or cancellation of a government contract, no termination pay will be given. In most cases, if a termination pay program exists for engineers it is not even discussed. Mr. Durham gives a chilling example in his article of a technical manager in a critical job.

Durham reports a published policy statement on termination for accrued vacation existed at the company in question: "When the axe fell (for more than 100 technical men) he (the technical manager) was given about 27 days notice during which period he would be expected to be on the job working. His unused vacation amounted to a total of 46 days extending over 8 years of employment. He requested pay for it at termination. The request was declined as unreasonable and he was blacklisted for further employment not only in that division, but in all other divisions of the company." No one knows how often this sort of thing happens.

It used to be an axiom that only the poor engineer who had not kept up his education got laid off. If a man was worth his salt, he always had a job. That talk has almost disappeared. While I cannot support this contention statistically, by asking at many meetings, "How many of you have ever been laid off?" it appears that well over 50% of the current work force has been laid off at least once. Layoff is no longer considered a black mark, but is now an accepted way of life for the engineer.

I am not sure what, if anything, should be done on the Federal level about defense spending. I do feel there is a strong responsibility to anticipate what will happen and to plan as best we can. I feel that consideration should be given on the state level to the following:

1. Establish a "Truth in Benefits" program for California, using the guidelines already established in our truth in lending legislation. Make it mandatory that employers inform employees as to exactly what their benefits are, what they cost, when they become effective, what they pay, when they terminate, conversion privileges and how the conversion is to be effected.

2. Amend the State Insurance code to require any firm offering group health insurance to offer conversion for any employee who is laid off or terminates employment for legitimate reasons. The conversion policy should be available at rates not greater than those paid in the group. Some reduction in benefits could be allowed, but this must be carefully controlled.

3. Amend the State Insurance Code so that group life insurance would be convertible to any form of insurance currently written by the carrier at the rates then in effect.

4. Amend the Unemployment Insurance Program to allow a higher level of benefit based on earnings. If necessary, raise the amount of base earnings upon which contributions are based. A percent of recent earnings, rather than the current flat amounts should be considered. The code as currently constructed is discriminatory against the higher paid employee.

5. Eliminate those provisions of the Unemployment Code that disqualify individuals from benefits because they receive accumulated vacation pay.

6. Aid the State Department of employment placement service by initiating programs whereby employers must list available openings for engineers and scientists. Apply the truth in benefits concepts so that the value of each company's benefits are known. In this way job applicants can make informed decisions as to where to go and the relative value of employment offered.

7. Establish a study program to identify our pressing social and community needs. Rank these in order of priority and magnitude. Study which engineering and scientific specialities have transferability. Establish some funding so that when these specialties have become surplus we can assign parcels of work until the labor market adjusts to the major dislocations.

8. Establish dislocation allowances through the Department of Employment to assist those who must move to find employment.

9. For those firms doing business in California, and hopefully on the national level, a central pension clearing house so that as engineers go from job to job their pension credits, and perhaps even industry credits for vacation and sick leave will follow.

None of the above programs will create any new jobs, or stop layoffs. They will give a degree of security to those who are willing to dedicate their work lives to defense-oriented employment. Human dignity and self-respect suffer under insecurity.

If the above programs were implemented, much of the economic impact of layoff would be mitigated. Further, there would be no temptation on the part of the employers to manipulate who is selected for termination based upon cost of certain programs because the majority of cost advantage from such manipulation would be gone.

Clearly the heart of the problem is not to have these abrupt terminations that throw everything in turmoil. We must recognize that no one in government has infallible wisdom in selecting programs. I feel it would be irresponsible to say that once a program is started it must be completed.

Let us assume we agree that under all current considerations it was not in the national interest to continue with the Manned Orbiting Laboratory. When the decision was made to build the M.O.L., the McDonnell Douglas company committed substantial funds and many thousands of employees several years of their lives. If later developments show that a project like M.O.L. should be dropped, I feel the Federal government should assume responsibility for its actions upon cancellation and;

1. Grant each employee laid off at least four weeks pay.

2. Cover the costs of employee group insurance for at least six months or until re-employed.

3. Establish provisions to insure that funds contributed to retirement plans inure to the benefit of the individual.

4. Establish or participate with State Government in establishing relocation allowances.

Many of the points I have set forth today, and suggestions have been dealt with briefly, as a full discussion would require more time than is practical.

While I have outlined an array of possible action programs, the next and most logical step, in my opinion, is to fund for a comprehensive study of not only my recommendations, but the others that will be presented.

Then, based upon full information, specific legislative programs should be formulated and presented for consideration. I sincerely hope the findings of your committee, and the recommendations that your staff will develop will not suffer the standard fate of "receive and file".

SENATE—Wednesday, March, 25, 1970

The Senate, in executive session, met at 9:30 o'clock a.m., and was called to order by the Acting President pro tempore (Mr. METCALF).

O Holy God, whose ways are higher than our ways and whose kingdom is everlasting, in this week of holy remembrance, keep our eyes fixed on Thee and direct all our work for the betterment of this Nation.

Deliver us from inordinate attention to the small concerns of the day so that we may give our energies to the paramount needs of this moment of history. Unite us where we are divided, reconcile us where we differ, and redeem us from all evil.

O Lord, grant us grace and wisdom to close the chasm between the strong and the weak, the rich and the poor, the rulers and the ruled, that dwelling together in the spirit of unity and the bonds of peace we may be masters of our own destiny. May Thy spirit so pervade the life of all the people that together we may build the holy city foretold by all the prophets since the world began. In the Redeemer's name we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, March 24, 1970, be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) is recognized for not to exceed 30 minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me, without losing his right to the floor or having any time taken out of his time?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that all committees be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in adjournment until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR EAGLETON TOMORROW

Mr. MANSFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow, after the prayer, the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) be recognized for not to exceed 45 minutes.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE HOSPITAL AT NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of Calendar 742. For the information of the Senate, this has been cleared on all sides.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title.

The ASSISTANT LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H.R. 13448) to authorize the exchange, upon terms fully protecting the public interest, of the lands and buildings now constituting the U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at New Orleans, La., for lands upon which a new U.S. Public Health Service Hospital at New Orleans, La., may be located.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare with amendments, on page 2, line 1, after the word "the" where it appears the first time, strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund"; in line 8, after the word "the" strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund"; and in line 17, after the word "the" where it appears the first time, strike out "administrators of the Tulane educational fund" and insert "Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund."

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I am delighted that unanimous consent was granted to permit consideration of the pending bill. I ask that it be passed.

Its purpose is to permit the Public Health Service to participate in the construction of a new medical complex in association with Tulane University in New Orleans, La., by authorizing the exchange of the present Public Health Service hospital site and buildings in New Orleans for lands of equal value presently owned by Tulane University. If it is determined that the value of the present properties owned by the United States exceed the market value of the lands exchanged therefor, the bill provides for payment to the United States of the additional amounts required to reimburse the United States in full.

The bill specifically states that the exchange authorized shall not be made unless the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare determines first, that the value to the United States of the property to be conveyed to it is equal to or in excess of the market value of the property to be conveyed by the United States, or second, that the United States is to receive from the Administrators of the Tulane Educational Fund upon conveyance of the properties to be exchanged, a sum of money equal to the amount by which the market value of the property to be conveyed by the United States exceeds the value to the United States of the property to be conveyed to the United States. Any money received shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

It can readily be seen that the interest of the public is adequately taken care of.

The Tulane School of Medicine-Public Health Service hospital affiliation has developed over a period of years and is one of mutual respect and cooperation. Currently medical students from Tulane are assigned to the Public Health Service hospital for a portion of their clinical training and a limited number of Tulane residents are also assigned to the hospital. In addition, cooperative research efforts in the areas of clinical and health services research have been carried out for several years. The distance of the hospital from the medical school and the hospital's facility limitations have minimized collaborative efforts between the institutions. In a new facility readily available, the number of medical students and residents assigned to the Public Health Service hospital could be increased and cooperative research activities expanded. The proposed Public Health Service facility adjacent to the school would provide additional teaching beds for the planned increase in the number of students admitted to the medical school. This year 135 students were accepted and it is proposed that this number be increased to 162 by 1974.

Tulane at the present time does not have a teaching hospital but utilizes Charity Hospital for most of its teaching beds. A study is now underway to explore alternative means of providing additional required teaching beds. A new Public Health Service hospital adjacent to the Tulane Medical School would increase Tulane's educational capability, improve the type of care provided to Public Health Service patients, and allow for conducting clinical and health services research on a broader basis.

Because of the important advantages to Tulane University and to the overall development of a great medical complex in New Orleans, Tulane with its own funds and with borrowed money has proceeded to acquire the site in which the U.S. Public Health Service indicated interest. Most of the land has now been obtained.

Two points are emphasized with respect to H.R. 13448. The first is that the interests of the U.S. Government are fully protected in that the transfer of lands contemplated in the building will have to be accomplished at no net cost to the Government. If the land to be provided by Tulane is less in value than the existing U.S. Public Health Service site, Tulane is obligated to pay the difference into the Treasury of the United States.

The second point of emphasis is that this is permissive legislation. Its passage will simply make it possible for the transfer to be concluded in the event the Public Health Service wishes to go ahead with the transfer and, for that matter, if the conditions are such that Tulane wishes to go ahead with the exchange. The passage of the bill would facilitate the planning of both institutions.

In conclusion, the location of a modern Public Health Service facility adjacent to the Tulane School of Medicine would contribute in a major way to Tulane's effort in educating physicians and conducting research directed toward improving the health of the country.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the committee amendments are agreed to en bloc.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD) is recognized for 30 minutes.

S. 3632—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO DEAL WITH THE POPULATION CRISIS

Mr. PACKWOOD. Mr. President, the 1970's are the bicentennial decade of this country. Nearly 200 years ago our ancestors in effect looked the venerable English King George III in the eye and said:

> No, thank you. Your system may work very well in England, but it does not work here. We are going to govern ourselves.

And for the last 200 years, we have indeed done things differently. We have settled a continent on the basis of equality for every State and opportunity for all individuals. We have come to lead the world in technical skill and industrial power. We have sent our citizens to walk on the moon. And as a Nation we have never turned away from any challenge because it was too big, too fearsome, too hard to manage.

Our vision has been westward. Our eyes have been on the future. Our concern has always been "what can be," not "what might have been." We have not been afraid to ask apparently unanswerable questions and then to search for the answers while others were still framing their questions.

Today, I believe the time has come when we as a Nation must ask ourselves a new set of questions and then we must look together toward the future—not backwards into the past—to find a new set of answers.

Today our country faces a pervading crisis which some call a population explosion, others an ecological threat, still others a polluted environment, because population and pollution are interdependent, I will speak of a population crisis—a crisis which makes a mockery of "America the beautiful." Who could write today that our "alabaster cities gleam undimmed by human tears"? Even our "purple mountain majesties above the fruited plain" are hidden by a veil of smog, while DDT and fertilizers pour pollution from the golden wheat fields into opaque and sluggish water.

We are living today in a country of more than 200 million people; 70 percent of the population is urban: population density along our east and west coasts is increasing even faster than the population of India, and in spite of our affluence and ingenuity, we are beginning to have trouble in buying clean air, pure water, or simply a piece of unoccupied space.

The real threat facing us is not creeping socialism or creeping capitalism, but rather creeping populationism. the growth of our population, generation by generation, year by year, is putting pressure on many of the resources we value; not only our lands and waters, our forests and plains, but also our schools and hospitals, our roads and cities, our recreation and, ultimately, of course, our whole standard of living.

President Nixon has already given unprecedented attention to population growth. In the first Presidential message to Congress on population last summer the President said:

> I believe that many of our present social problems may be related to the fact that we have had only fifty years in which to accommodate the second hundred million Americans. In fact, since 1945 alone some 90 million babies have been born in this country. We have thus had to accomplish in a very few decades an adjustment to population growth which was once spread over centuries, and it now appears that we will have to provide for a third hundred million Americans in a period of just 30 years.

Human life exists only in the space of barely half a mile of oxygen above the land areas of this planet. Human population cannot expand indefinitely because to the best of our knowledge, there are no other points in the entire universe where human beings can survive. Furthermore, every single human being becomes a burden on the environment: his food, shelter, his very breath, and all his possessions come from the resources—some renewable, many more not renewable—of this narrow life-giving layer.

During a normal lifetime the average American will devour 28,000 pounds of milk and cream, 10,000 pounds of meat, and 26 million gallons of water; he will require 21 million gallons of gasoline and $8,000 worth of school construction. He will purchase $6,000 worth of clothes and $7,000 worth of furniture. And to supply these demands, America will produce nearly 50 percent of the world's industrial pollution. In this vast consumptive process, Americans pay the garbage collectors nearly $3 billion every year just to collect the debris.

These numbers translate into the gradually deteriorating pictures of everyday life—dirty air, dying waters, slum-ridden cities, crowded parks, bumper-to-bumper traffic, a greater and greater struggle for less and less space—and with every half century, the appalling expectation that our population will double and redouble and double again. Until we see that an end is in sight, until we recognize that population and pollution are one and the same, until we appreciate that all our efforts for a pure environment are really nothing more than an effort to erase the dirty traces of mankind from the clean patterns of natural development—we will not find a lasting solution. We are in effect chasing our own tails in an endless and seemingly insane cycle of production, reproduction, construction and destruction.

Mr. President, three steps are necessary if we are to avoid not only the 100 million projected population increase in this country in the next 30 years but an increase to half a billion people within the next 60 to 80 years.

The first step we must take is mass family planning. A small step in this direction is S. 2108, of which I am a cosponsor. By mass family planning, I mean making available both the knowledge of and the access to contraceptive information and devices for every woman in this country. Lack of education or lack of money should not be a deterrent. We must do adequate research to develop three or four varieties of good contraceptive devices so that women who cannot tolerate one form of contraception will have others available to them. The purpose is to make sure that no woman becomes pregnant because of the lack of information about, or lack of access to, adequate contraceptive devices.

The second necessary step is to eliminate all restrictions against abortion in this country. Abortion should be a matter of private conscience for every woman in this country. Whether or not she wishes to have an abortion should be a decision that solely she and her physician makes. Dr. Charles F. Westoff of the office of population research at Princeton University indicates that approximately 22 percent of the pregnancies among married couples in this country are unwanted by at least one spouse. There is no reason why a woman should be forced to continue an unwanted pregnancy. Those women who can afford abortions should pay for them as they pay for other medical services. However, those women who cannot should not be forced to continue an unwanted pregnancy. Financial resources or medical services should be made available to those women so that they, too, can have the same rights as those with money.

The third step and the conclusive one which should enable us to effect population stabilization in this country is a Government taxation policy which encourages smaller families. We use tax incentives to encourage oil exploration; we use them to encourage the installation of pollution abatement devices; we use tax incentives to foster the growth of pension plans. Is there any reason why we should not use the tax incentive to tackle the most critical domestic problem in our country—the population crisis?

I am today introducing a bill which would limit child dependency deductions for children to no more than two starting on January 1, 1973. Hopefully with these three programs; first, good family planning; second, elimination of restrictions against abortion; and third, tax incentives for smaller families, we will achieve population stabilization in this country.

I have introduced these bills not because I think it is impossible to feed half a billion people in this country. We could perhaps feed that many people if we do not care whether or not we overutilize the farm land, and if we ignored the effect that pesticides used on the crops to feed that many people might have on the rest of the country. It might even be possible to house half a billion people if we do not care whether or not we cut down all of the trees in our forests and then deplete other natural resources that would have to be found as a substitute for wood to build that many houses. We might even be able to handle the solid waste disposal and the air and water pollution that half a billion people would cause.

But at some stage, even the United States is finite. At some point we will reach a limit where we cannot feed, cannot house, and cannot clean up after all of the people who might be born in this country.

We must face the problem now and undertake a policy of population stabilization whereby we can look forward to limiting the population of this country by voluntary means, rather than having to do it in 40 or 50 or 60 years by compulsory means.

So I have introduced these three bills to offer honesty where we have had too much hypocrisy; to offer rationality where we have had too little commonsense; and to offer, I hope, an opportunity for our children and our children's children a better balance between man and his environment.

The time has come to look—without blinking or averting our eyes—at where we stand today in the population crisis. What was appropriate for Adam and Eve in biblical times or for our own forebears who crossed and populated a continent is no longer appropriate in a world of more than three billion people where two-thirds of all children are poor, hungry, or dirty, and without much hope of improvement. Our forebears had commonsense and determination. They possessed these qualities in abundance in taming the continent. Today the challenge is ours: Do we have the commonsense and determination to respond?

It does not matter that 50 or 100 years from now history will look back and remember BOB PACKWOOD as a U.S. Senator or any other Member of this body as a U.S. Senator. What is important is that future generations will look back and appreciate the sensible policies which we have implemented to achieve a stabilized population.

If they can breathe clean air and enjoy pure water; if they can still relish a cascading river tumbling through a deep gorge that has not been dammed because of the necessity to produce electric power; if they can walk through a forest that has not been completely cut to produce homes for half a billion people; and if they can find a place where tranquillity and quiet is still an actuality rather than a memory, then we will have fulfilled the adage which says:

What we have in this life when we die will pass to somebody else; what we are in this life will be ours forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3632) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to limit the number of personal exemptions allowable for children of a taxpayer who are born after 1972, introduced by Mr. PACKWOOD, was received, read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Does the Senator from Oregon yield the floor?

Mr. PACKWOOD. I yield the floor.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, under the previous order, who was to be recognized at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) is supposed to be recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a quorum call, without prejudice to the Senator from Texas under the previous order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, without prejudicing the rights of the Senator from Texas, under the previous order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from West Virginia.

SEATO SHOULD BE REORGANIZED ALONG MORE ASIAN LINES

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, the continuing war in Vietnam, the increasing hostilities in Laos, and the recent coup in Cambodia, illustrate all too clearly the almost total impotence of the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization.

The United States, while moving to Vietnamize the war in Vietnam, should also move to Asianize SEATO—or, failing that, we should withdraw completely from the organization.

When he addressed the opening session of SEATO on September 8, 1954, the late Ramon Magsaysay, President of the Philippines, said:

On the success of this conference may well depend the peace of Asia in the next 10 years and the future of freedom in the world for the next thousand years. We propose to stand up and be counted.

Unfortunately, the 16 years that have elapsed since SEATO was founded have not produced peace in Asia. Instead, they have produced little more than a continuation of the strife that has plagued that part of the world for centuries.

In other words, Mr. President, SEATO has failed in its efforts to become a viable deterrent to war in Asia; and, to a large extent, its failure is a direct result of the manner in which it was organized—the manner in which it exists today.

Of the eight nations which formed SEATO, only four—Australia, New Zealand, Thailand, and the Philippines—still have long-range interests in Southeast Asia. Australia and New Zealand are becoming increasingly aware of their geographic kinship, while Thailand and the Philippines have always been among the most energetic of Asian nations.

The United States, which pays 25 percent of SEATO expenses, is heavily engaged in Southeast Asia at the present time. But our only long-range interest is in preparing Asian nations to be able to defend themselves.

President Nixon stated our aims during an informal news conference on Guam last July 25. During that conference, he laid the groundwork for what has become known as the Nixon doctrine which, in part, says:

> Others now have the ability and responsibility to deal with local disputes which once might have required our intervention. Our contribution and success will depend not on the frequency of our involvement in the affairs of others, but on the stamina of our policies. This is the approach which will best encourage other nations to do their part, and will most genuinely enlist the support of the American people.

That statement makes it abundantly clear that the nations of Southeast Asia must prepare now for the time when they will have to shoulder the heaviest burden against Communist aggression.

The United States cannot do it alone, and the other two western nations in SEATO—England and France—have apparently lost all interest in the organization and in Southeast Asia itself. They no longer have colonies in that part of the world—no longer have an interest in the people who lived for so many years under their rule.

The final SEATO nation, Pakistan, joined simply because it felt the organization could offer it a measure of strength against India. Since SEATO could make no such offer, Pakistan's inital disillusionment quickly turned to lasting apathy.

However, Mr. President, I am not so much concerned with the nations admitted to SEATO as I am with the nations not admitted.

Laos and Cambodia were both convered under the organization's protocol, rather than granted full admittance. Cambodia removed itself from even this quasi-membership in September of 1955, and Laos was removed by the 1962 Geneva accords. Vietnam, the third former Indo-China State, was barred from consideration as a protocol state under SEATO because of the 1954 Geneva Convention.

Thus, Mr. President, we have the current situation in which the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization is powerless to act—even if it were willing to do so—in Vietnam, Laos, or Cambodia—powerless to forge solutions to the most pressing problems of Southeast Asia.

In the case of Cambodia, this is particularly tragic. In the wake of the recent overthrow of Prince Sihanouk, the Cambodian Government finds itself faced with the possibility of engaging in combat with Communist forces—and it finds itself unprepared to wage such a battle. As Washington Post correspondent Stanley Karnow noted in his Sunday, March 22, article:

> With a small and ill-equipped army at their disposal, Cambodia's new leaders appear to have only a single option open to them: a plea for American help.

Mr. President, given the current state of affairs both here at home and in Vietnam and Laos, such a plea would probably go unanswered. The United States is just not ready to unilaterally open up a new front in what could become a new Indo-China war, and the United States should not do so.

If a viable SEATO were in existence today—a SEATO designed and operated by the free nations of Asia—the plight of Cambodia might be less frightened than it now appears.

I feel, Mr. President, that we should take immediate steps to explore the existence of such an organization in the future—an organization either formed by revamping the present structure of SEATO, or organized from scratch by the free nations of Asia.

Under Article 8 of the SEATO Charter, it states that the treaty area: "is the general area of South-East Asia, including also the entire territories of the Asia parties, and the general area of the South-West Pacific."

It is futile to think that so large an area of Asia can be effectively guarded by so few Asian nations. It is futile, for instance, to think of an effective SEATO that does not include Malaysia and Indonesia.

Malaya gained independence from England in 1957, and the Malaysian States were formed in 1963. Yet, no invitation to join SEATO was ever tendered. For its part, Indonesia overthrew the Communist-leaning government of President Sukarno on September 30, 1965; and 5 years have now gone by with SEATO making no concrete offers of membership to the new Indonesian Government.

Splitting with the Communist bloc was not an easy decision for Indonesia. Under Sukarno, it had relied heavily on the Soviet Union, which, since 1965, has shown predictable reluctance in refinancing almost a billion dollars in loans. Indonesia has been forced to turn to the United States for assistance during the past half decade; and our aid to that country has increased from $19.7 million in 1966 to $61 million last year.

It would have been far more meaningful to the future of Asia if Indonesia could have turned instead to SEATO.

To be sure, Mr. President, the apathy of SEATO toward broadening its base has been equalled by the reluctance of Asian nations to seek membership. But there are two very good reasons for this reluctance.

First, with the exception of Thailand, all the countries in Southeast Asia were formerly colonial possessions of some Western power. Their sensitivity to that history makes them leary about joining any organization that is, in large part, comprised of non-Asian countries.

And second, the Southeast Asia Treaty Organization proved to be highly ineffective the one time it was called upon to act. That was in March of 1962, when Communist forces in Laos threatened the northeast border of Thailand.

Instead of depending on SEATO, Thailand went to the United States for assurances of support. In what became known as the Thanat-Rusk Communique, Secretary of State Dean Rusk assured the Thai Foreign Minister that the United States: "intends to give full effect to its obligations under the Treaty to meet the common danger in accordance with its constitutional processes. (The United States) reaffirms that this obligation does not depend upon the prior agreement of all other parties to the Treaty, since this Treaty obligation is individual as well as collective."

The communique formed the basis for the United States sending 5,000 Marines to Thailand the following month; and it also showed the inability and unwillingness of SEATO to act in time of crisis. The Thais were deeply indebted to the United States, but their respect for the other nations in SEATO took an understandable dip. In fact, schoolchildren, as they pass the Bangkok headquarters of SEATO, refer to the organization as "Sleep, Eat, And Talk Only."

Mr. President, it is a source of pride in all Americans that our country fully meet its obligations—none of us would want it any other way. But I believe the time has come for Asians to shoulder the main responsibility of assuring freedom in their part of the world. This is what the Nixon doctrine says, and I hope the doctrine also provides for a revamping of SEATO—rather than simply letting it be killed off by the apathy of its present participants.

If such a reorganization of SEATO along more Asian lines cannot be implemented, then I would favor a U.S. withdrawal from the organization—because, as it now operates, it is virtually meaningless, except for the commitment and obligations which it imposes on the United States. In other words, the ghost is presently being kept alive mostly by the United States active response to its commitment.

Terms of withdrawing from SEATO are spelled out under article 10 of its charter:

> Any Party may cease to be a Party one year after its notice of denunciation has been given to the Government of the Republic of the Philippines, which shall inform the Governments of the other Parties of the deposit of each denunciation.

Such a withdrawal on our part, Mr. President, could convince the free nations of Asia to put aside regional differences and unite behind the common cause of fighting the very real Communist menace. There is evidence they are willing to do. The New York Times News Service noted in a March 17 dispatch that former enemies: "Malaysia and Indonesia today signed a new treaty of friendship intended to replace an agreement which lapsed during President Sukarno's policy of confrontation."

If these two nations can move toward unity, then perhaps Thailand and Cambodia—which have been at odds for centuries—can also find common grounds for discussion and, hopefully, for agreement.

At the very least, we should give free Asian nations the encouragement to Asianize SEATO. We should give these nations the opportunity to make good on the promise of Ramon Magsaysay—"to stand up and be counted." A truly Asian SEATO, with the United States taking a less dominant role, or no role at all, could offer that opportunity.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER) is now recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

REMOVING UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE CASES FROM THE JURISDICTION OF THE NLRB

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, since its founding 35 years ago, the National Labor Relations Board has developed for itself the unenviable reputation of an agency given to "arrogant fact distortion, questionable legal interpretation, and callousness toward due process requirements." The words are not mine, but I concur in the thought so expressed by Prof. Sylvester Petro, one of the Nation's foremost authorities on labor problems. Even former Congressman Fred Hartley, Jr., coauthor of the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947, has said that the NLRB has "mutilated and emasculated" the law which bears his name.

Our colleague, Senator GRIFFIN, in testifying before the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers in 1968, recalled a statement made by David Brinkley to the effect that the NLRB "usually behaves like a body of the AFL–CIO and is about as neutral as George Meany."

The hearings which I have just mentioned revealed a complete lack of public confidence in the National Labor Relations Board. This reflects adversely on Congress for the NLRB is of our own creation.

Witness after witness appeared before the Ervin subcommittee to protest the tenor of the actions of the Labor Board. Endless cases were cited which would have convinced even the most die-hard of the Labor Board's champions that congressionally enunciated labor policies had been ditched in favor of divergent approaches formulated by the Board. Having reviewed the testimony, there is no question in my mind about the objectivity of the witnesses. This was not simply a case of business versus labor during which management had its day on the witness stand. Those testifying presented cogent arguments to back up their contentions. The general opinion which emerged substantiated the open secret among all who must deal with the Labor Board: that the principle of free employee choice has been subverted by the Board's obvious preference for a policy of enforced unionization.

Mr. President, it is not my intention today to hold up the business of the Senate with a recitation of cases. The record has been made and is there for those interested to read. The conclusion is too clear to deny. Congress delegated quasi-judicial powers to the National Labor Relations Board to make effective a clearly enunciated labor policy.

The Board exercised these powers but ignored congressional policy and proceeded on a self-directed course. Further action is demanded of this body if it is to fulfill its constitutional responsibilities. To fail to remedy the present situation would be a gross abdication of our duties. Congress has had 35 years in which to assess the value of our own delegation of responsibility and authority over national labor policy and to evaluate how faithfully the NLRB has carried out its functions.

One of the major political innovations of the 20th century—an innovation which remains still an experiment—is the delegation of congressional power to the agencies comprising the so-called independent fourth branch of government. Their authority derives from Congress, but their functions are legislative, executive and judicial. We favor a separation of powers in our own constitutional form of government, but we have found no way to impose this structure on the regulatory agencies.

A government which involves itself in the minutia of business management and addresses itself to the particulars of labor relations must delegate vast powers to a bureaucracy. There is no way the Congress can set rates for the transport of hundreds of thousands of commodities in interstate commerce any more than it can involve itself in a case-by-case analysis of unfair labor practices. If it desires such control, then a "headless fourth branch of government," as the regulatory agencies have been called, is the inevitable result.

How successful the regulatory experiment in general has been is a question to be answered at another time. Our experience with the National Labor Relations Board has not been favorable. An interesting difference between the Board and other agencies is that Congress need not involve itself in deciding unfair labor practice cases. This was originally the function of the Federal judiciary, and I believe, these are powers which we would be well advised to return to Federal district courts.

Probably the most serious allegation against the Board is that it has willfully ignored section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act which states:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid and protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities.

For special emphasis I repeat the last phrase: "and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities."

Section 7 has been called the "central dominant provision of the National Labor Relations Act" and the "most significant and most carefully considered expression of Congress fundamental labor policy."

In his appearance before the Ervin subcommittee in 1968, Prof. Sylvester Petro, a professor of law at the New York University School of Law, expressed the opinion that Congress had rated collective bargaining superior to employee freedom of choice in the Wagner Act, but that it specifically reversed this priority with passage of the National Labor Relations Act.

To quote from his testimony:

> The Labor Board, sometimes blatantly, more often hypocritically and disingeniously, but ever persistently has been attempting to restore the state of affairs prevailing under the Wagner Act. It has been trying, often successfully, to re-evaluate union organizing privileges and collective bargaining over the principle of free employee choice.

Professor Petro goes on to cite the Board's insistence that employers make concessions to the unions during bargaining to demonstrate their good faith—in defiance of clear statutory language to the effect that neither concessions nor agreements were required—and that the Board almost daily infringes upon the constitutional rights of the employers through its constriction of his freedom to speak.

He concludes:

> Congress' labor policies survive in about the same proportion and to about the same extent as do the reviewing powers of the Federal courts of appeals.

I shall ask that the text of Professor Petro's testimony be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks so that Senators who have not had the opportunity to study his very valuable conclusions may do so.

The argument is sometimes made that labor relations are such a distinct and inordinately complex field that they must be administered by specially qualified technicians familiar with and possessing expertise in this field.

I say the argument is made. The case has never been proven to my satisfaction that labor relations are any more complex than any other thousands of relationships with which the judiciary is called upon to deal daily. We do not assign judges to cases on the basis of their expertise in aerospace, when that is involved, or medicine, or mental therapy, or disputed contracts by motion picture actresses, or any of a number of other relationships.

In fact, judges do possess expertise in the only area which is important: they are practiced in the art of legal administration. The judicial temperament requires, to quote Professor Petro again, "a strong but open mind; a habit of reserving judgment until all the facts are in and disinterestedly evaluated; a willingness to listen—really listen—to argument; patience; respect for the opinions of other judges; a good logical mind which will adequately distinguish the relevant from the irrelevant facts and the cogent from the illogical arguments; an inclination to start out every case believing that the facts, the law, and the arguments—not the identity of the parties—should determine the decision."

I submit that these qualities are precisely the ones which have been conspicuously absent in the decisionmaking processes of the National Labor Relations Board in recent years.

I intend to introduce legislation which would remove unfair labor practice cases from NLRB jurisdiction and place them in Federal district courts. Unfair labor practice cases constitute, of course, the vast bulk of NLRB business.

It is not my intention to introduce this legislation today. I shall merely ask that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I intend to send a letter to other Senators and provide them with the opportunity to join in cosponsoring this bill if they so desire. It is my intention to introduce the bill next week.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Sylvester Petro testimony and a copy of my bill which I intend to introduce be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the testimony and the bill were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEPARATION OF POWERS AND THE LABOR ACT—HOW A DELEGATION OF JUDICIAL POWER TO AN EXECUTIVE AGENCY HAS BROUGHT ABOUT A LOSS OF POLICYMAKING LEGISLATIVE POWER TO THE CONGRESS

(By Sylvester Petro, professor of law, New York University)

I. SUMMARY STATEMENT

When the Senate was considering the Taft-Hartley Bill in 1947, Senator Joseph H. Ball, though himself a leading proponent of the Bill, called attention to its outstanding weakness. He said: "The rights guaranteed to employees . . . could be made a complete dead letter overnight by a National Labor Relations Board that was so inclined." [1]

One of the major objectives of the Taft-Hartley Act was to secure a fairer administration of the national labor policy, an application of the Labor Act more faithful to Congressional intent, than the Labor Board had provided under the Wagner Act.[2] Congress hoped in 1947 that such a result could be achieved by a number of provisions which exhorted the Labor Board to operate more in the manner of a regular court.[3] Unfortunately, however, the Labor Board members were asked to produce judicial results without being given one of the essential characteristics of federal judicial office—life tenure—and without being placed in the only branch of the federal government which can, if it wishes, devote itself essentially to nonpolitical, disinterested interpretation and application of law—namely, the federal judiciary. Asking the short-term, politically oriented Labor-Board members to act like a court was like asking a baseball pitcher to call his own balls and strikes. This is what disturbed Senator Ball. His fears have been borne out.

The labor policies prevailing today are as much those of the Labor Board as they are those declared by Congress in the National Labor Relations Act. The two are radically different in certain critical respects. Since the Labor Board is an administrative agency, and since the Constitution delegates all policy-making, legislative powers to Congress, a miscarriage of the principle of the separation of powers has occurred.

This miscarriage was not brought about by any defect inherent in the principle itself. It was brought about by a violation of the principle. Influenced by plausible error, Congress merged into a short-term politically oriented executive agency significant aspects of administrative, judicial, and legislative power. That merger upset the delicate balance which the Consitution establishes. It gave the administrative branch a critical edge over and above the natural advantage which it possesses as the activist branch of government—the only branch which possesses and wields substantial and sustained aggressive power, much money, and hordes of personnel.

The observable result is that Congress's labor policies now prevail only to the extent that the United States Courts of Appeals continue to exercise in Labor-Act cases the fragments of their constitutional judicial power that Congress and the Supreme Court permit them to exercise.[4]

It adds up to this: if Congress wishes to preserve its legislative policy-making supremacy, it must respect the judicial supremacy of the federal courts. We attain the height of practical realism today when we rediscover what Americans learned in the 18th Century, what Englishmen learned and re-learned a dozen times from the 11th Century to the 17th Century, and what Aristotle discovered in the 4th Century, B.C., namely, that executive power is strong stuff which must be carefully guarded.

Here, I respectfully submit, are the practical principles which should influence the thinking of this Subcommittee on Separation of Powers:

1. That a wary legislature and an independent court system with complete and unfragmented judicial power—even working as deliberate allies—are by no means overwatched against an ambitious executive;

2. That if the rule of law is to be roughly approximated, executive power must be confined to pure administration, even when plausible arguments, based on convenience or on necessity, are made in favor of adding legislative and judicial powers to the executive power;

3. That if all the inordinately complex and intersecting interests of this nation are to be harmonized and reconciled tolerably, it is going to have to be done by policies and legislation wrought from the kind of deliberation and compromise available exclusively to the representative branch of government, namely Congress;

4. That the executive branch is physically and politically unable to confine itself to disinterested interpretation and application of Congress's policies and statutes—especially those conceived and enacted in past times;

5. That an independent judiciary such as that envisioned by the Constitution may perhaps not be sufficient to insure faithful interpretation and application of the laws, owing to the possibility that men inherently lacking the requisite moral and intellectual virtues will be appointed for life to judicial office; but that nevertheless life tenure in judicial office, as the Constitution requires, is absolutely necessary if the policy-making legislative supremacy of Congress is to be preserved; and that to repeat if Congress wishes to maintain its constitutional legislative supremacy, it is going to have to accept and affirm the constitutional judicial supremacy of the federal judges.

There is more at stake here than an academic exercise in political theory. The nation is in trouble. Some of this trouble traces directly to the Labor Board's usurpation of the policy-making power and its clumsily biased exercise of judicial powers. While producing no perceptible social benefit, the Labor Board's administration of the Labor Act has been the source of definite social harm. Since its policies are materially at odds with those of Congress and since Congress represents public opinion far better than the Labor Board does, we may conclude that public sentiment is being flouted. That is evil enough in a country which values representative government. But there are other evils. Perhaps the worst product of the Board's unrepresentative labor policies has been a chronic, debilitating threat to the viability of the American economy, upon which rest both the well-being of American citizens and the hopes of decent men and women everywhere in the world.

II. CONGRESSIONAL POLICIES VERSUS LABOR BOARD POLICIES

Occupying the vital center of the labor policies declared by Congress is the principle of free employee choice. This principle was not worked out over-night in Congress. On the contrary, it emerged from over a half-century of legislative experimentation. It is visible in primitive and fragmentary form as far back as the Erdman Act of 1898. It figured implicitly in the Clayton Act of 1914 and explicitly in the Railway Labor Act of 1925, the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, and the labor relations legislation of the mid-thirties. It has come to rest in complete and definitive form in the central, dominant provision of the National Relations Act, Section 7, the most significant and most carefully considered expression of Congress's fundamental labor policy. Section 7 declares that:

"Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities. . ."

Added in 1947, the italicized clause expressed what may be called a "quantum jump" in public and congressional evaluation of employee rights and collective bargaining. Prior thereto, as illustrated by the Wagner Act, public and congressional opinion seemed convinced that collective bargaining was so unqualifiedly in the public interest that there was no need to subordinate it to any other principle or even to place any federal restraints upon trade-union activities, however coercive, designed to spread collective bargaining. No doubt employee rights to freedom of choice in collective bargaining were even then favorably evaluated; Section 7 of the Wagner Act stated them, and Section 8 was comprehensively designed to forestall employer coercion of employee rights, However, the absence of any prohibition upon union activities designed coercively to impose unionization upon unwilling employees implies that Congress rated collective bargaining superior to employee freedom of choice.

Events during the Wagner Act period (1935–1947) brought about what has proved to be a permanent change of mind both in the general public and in Congress. Whereas previously unions and collective bargaining were thought to be unqualifiedly in the public interest, most people began seeing in the late thirties and forties that unrestrained power and privilege in trade union officials and a monolithic pro-collective-bargaining policy could produce serious damage in the form of both abuse of individual employees and weakness in the economy.

Still unwilling to discourage either union expansion or collective bargaining, however, Congress decided to subject them to another principle, the principle of free employee choice, and did so, as we have seen, by expressly declaring a right of employees to refrain from joining unions, or bargaining collectively, or participating in other union activities. There can really be no doubt that in so legislating Congress faithfully represented persistent public opinion. The Congressional majority in favor of the Taft-Hartley Act was overwhelming. It remains so. So far as I can tell, and this is the field of any major long-run interest, public opinion today is more than ever suspicious of unrestrained power and privilege in trade unions. Legislative trends are toward more control of trade unions and collective bargaining, not less. The principle of free employee choice, Congress's basic principle in labor relations law, is not only congruent with the traditions of the country; it is also in accord with the present wishes of the American people as a whole.[5]

Notwithstanding all that, the Labor Board, sometimes blatantly, more often hypocritically and disingenuously, but ever persistently has been attempting to restore the state of affairs prevailing under the Wagner Act. It has been trying, often successfully, to re-evaluate union organizing privileges and collective bargaining over the principle of free employee choice.[6]

Upon occasion one may observe the process clearly at work. The relatively recent Garwin case [7] is an example. There the Board ordered an employer to bargain with a union even though none of his current employees belonged to that union. According to the Board, the order was necessary in order to remedy prior unfair practices. The fact that the order would have fastened upon employees a union which they obviously had not chosen seemed less important to the Board than the desirability of maintaining the bargaining status of the union involved. Fortunately a panel of judges was formed on the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia a majorty of which considered itself duty-bound to challenge the Board's evaluation of the policy issue. That Court, which does not habitually question the Board's policy determinations when they favor unionization or collective bargaining, held in this case that free employee choice is the paramount principle of the national labor policy and that the Board had incorrectly subordinated it to the bargaining principle.[8]

An almost equally egregious displacement of Congressional policy may be seen in the collective-bargaining rules which the Board has laid down. Congress guardedly and conditionally approved collective bargaining as an institution potentially in the public interest. The approval was conditioned upon the free choice of employees; there was to be no collective bargaining unless a majority of employees in the appropriate unit desired it. Moreover, the duty to bargain was carefully guarded by an explicit qualification in Section 8(d) to the effect that neither concessions nor agreements were required.

Defying these unmistakable indications of congressional intent, the Labor Board has held in hundreds of cases that employers must make concessions if they are to satisfy the good-faith bargaining requirement.[9] In the hands of the Labor Board, collective bargaining has become an institution encouraging unreasonable, uneconomic demands by unions and discouraging resistance to such demands by employers.[10]

It is true that the Board does not straightforwardly and explicitly compel concessions—as Judge Wright in an extraordinary opinion recently said it should do.[11] But any specialist in the field will agree that the employer who adamantly refuses to make any concession can expect to be harassed indefinitely by the Board, no matter how honest he is. As a result, employers tend to make concessions or offer counter-proposals whether or not they think it correct or economically feasible to do so. As a further result, collective bargaining practices are developing in an unwholesome way, and the law of collective bargaining surpasses the comprehension of even able practitioners.

A long string of NLRB decisions might be presented—each one requiring sustained and complicated analysis—in illustration of the Labor Board's persistent determination to replace Congress' policies with its own.[12] Mindful, however, that this Subcommittee is less interested in the substantive minutiae of current labor law than it is in the general aspects most relevant to the separation of powers, I confine myself to an account of only some of the outstanding examples of the Board's negation of Congressional policies in favor of its own.

One of Congress' dominant purposes in labor legislation over the past twenty years has been to apply equal rules to employers and unions in organizing campaigns. Even a superficial glance at the parallel subdivisions of Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act will convincingly reveal an intent to govern evenhandedly the activities of these normal rivals.[13] Again this approach faithfully mirrors public opinion, which has always favored the equal rule of law. Yet again the Labor Board has flouted both Congressional sentiment and the community consensus. The Board has stretched the rules relating to employer conduct to the point where infringement of constitutional right is a daily occurrence.[14] On the other hand it has confined regulation of even the most aggressive, coercive, and monopolistic union conduct to the level, at most, of mere annoyance.[15]

Whereas Congress in Section 8(c) of the NLRA expressly immunized expressions of opinion in order to make sure that employees would hear both sides in union organizational campaigns, and could thus register an informed choice on the issues, the Labor Board has steadily constricted those free speech rights. So much so that it is dangerous nowadays for an employer to open his mouth at all during an organizing campaign.[16] And yet, as an outstanding federal judge, Judge Friendly of the Second Circuit, has said, "If Section 8(c) does not permit an employer to counter promises of pie in the sky with reasonable warnings that the pie may be a mirage, it would indeed keep Congress' word of promise to the ear but break it to the hope."[17]

Common sense would seem to suggest that an employer cannot coerce employee free choice by unconditionally offering benefits. Yet the NLRB, with the approval of the Supreme Court, has been holding that an employer violates the Act in granting even the most innocuous benefits, or merely promising them, during an organizational campaign.[18] This may not seem a vastly important point. The fact is, though, that, together with the extra statutory limitations imposed upon employer free speech and other strained extensions of the law, it has made it possible for the Board to find employers guilty of unfair practices whenever they vigorously resist an organizational drive. The Board's apparent objective is to quell all resistance to union expansion. If it succeeds, employees and their freedom of choice will be the principal victims.

With its powers in such formidable array, the Board is in a position to impose collective bargaining virtually at will, quite regardless of the preferences which employees might register in the secret-ballot elections which the Board is tending to avoid. And this in spite of the fact that Congress has indicated that the preferred—if not the exclusive—means of establishing bargaining status for unions and imposing bargaining duties on employers is the secret-ballot election.[19] The tortured, devious methods by which the Board has thus flouted Congressional intent is well worth this Subcommittee's attention. The recent case of Bryant Chucking Grinder Co. v. NLRB[20] will serve as an example of how the Board is managing to impose collective bargaining, either without elections or, worse, in spite of election defeats. Here is an outline of the case.

1. A union had been defeated in a secret-ballot election in 1959.

2. In 1962 that union began another organizing campaign. The record showed that the union circulated employee authorization cards on the basis of both public and private representations that the cards would be used in order to secure another election, not in order to secure immediate recognition of the union as exclusive bargaining representative.

3. Cards were signed by 198 of the 337 employees in the bargaining unit, but the employer refused to recognize the union on the basis of the cards, insisting instead upon an election (as the law permits the employer to do).

4. An NLRB-conducted secret-ballot election was held in November, 1962. The union was rejected in this election by a vote of 184 to 124.

5. In December of 1962 the union filed objections to the election alleging employer interference.

6. Entertaining the objections, the Board ordered a new election.

7. After the Board ordered the new election, the union (for reasons not explained) withdrew both its objections to the past election and its petition for a new election; instead, in January of 1963, the union filed unfair labor practice charges against the employer based on his pre-election conduct.

8. The NLRB Regional Director dismissed these charges on the ground that they were disqualified by the Board's decision in Aiello Dairy Farms,[21] establishing the rule that charges would not be entertained when they related back to preelection conduct.

9. The union appealed the dismissal to the NLRB General Counsel.

10. The General Counsel sat on this appeal for roughly two years while prosecuting other cases in which he argued that the Board should overrule the Aiello Dairy Farms decision.

11. Finally, in Bernel Foam Products Co., Inc.,[22] the Labor Board overruled Aiello.

12. The General Counsel thereupon ordered the Regional Director to issue a complaint based on the charges filed by the union in this, the Bryant Chucking Grinder case.

13. Owing in part to delays common in the Board's glacial processes and in part to exceptional ineptitude on the part of the Board's Trial Examiner, an NLRB decision was not reached till late in 1966—some four years after the events in issue and the union's defeat by a vote of 184 to 124.

14. This NLRB decision[23] held—

(a) that the employer had never been entitled to the 1962 election because he had not had a reasonable basis for a "good-faith doubt" of the "majority status" established by the 198 signed authorization cards proffered in 1962;

(b) that the employer's conduct prior to the election interfered with the free choice of the employees and thus invalidated the election; and

(c) that the employer had a duty to bargain with the union from late 1966 on, despite the election defeat, because of the card majority in 1962.

The employer appealed to the Second Circuit.

Writing the court's decision, Judge Hays enforced the Board order with little attention to the facts of the case. Judge Friendly concurred specially, broadly indicating that he would much rather have denied enforcement of the Board order. He went along with Judge Hays, he said, because the Supreme Court's decision in NLRB v. Katz,[24] "was couched in terms so strong that to impose an exception requires more boldness than I possess."[25]

Judge Anderson, dissenting, took the position that it was not a matter of boldness at all but simply one of keeping the Board from inflicting another travesty of Congress's policies on the nation. He pointed out that the employer's pre-election conduct was innocuous; that the Union had misrepresented the purpose of the cards, thus disqualifying them as evidence of representative status; and that the Board's decision was imposing a bargaining representative upon employees who had shown only, if they had shown anything, that they did not wish to yield their individual rights to a union. Perhaps the most impressive fact adduced in Judge Anderson's powerful dissent was the difference in the bargaining unit in 1967 from what it had been in 1962, when the 197 cards were signed. There were 337 employees in the unit in 1962. There were 400 in 1967. Equally significantly, at least sixty of the card-signers had left Bryant Chucking in the intervening years. Thus Judge Anderson concluded, the Board was giving the union exclusive bargaining status for over 400 employees in 1967 on the basis of signatures by roughly 135 employees in 1962—signatures gained, moreover, on the representation that the cards would be used to secure an election![26]

The importance of this Subcommittee of the process illustrated by the Bryant Chucking case can scarcely be exaggerated. In the last two or three years that process seems to have become the preferred method of establishing bargaining status. If this is true, a wholesale departure from Congressionally declared rules and policies has occurred. It is not a matter only of abandoning the secret-ballot elections which Congress so clearly envisioned as the main means of establishing bargaining status. The full nature of the travesty cannot be appreciated unless one knows that the Board itself has frequently characterized authorization cards as unreliable methods of ascertaining employee choice.[27]

Moreover, the rigged processes evident in Bryant Chucking illustrate another radical departure from Congressional intent. One of the main objectives of the 1947 amendments of the Wagner Act was fairer and more judicious conduct by the Labor Board. The 1947 amendments sought to induce Board members to deal more scrupulously with the facts and to give more sensitive heed to due process requirement.[28] But the Labor Board has repaid this Congressional solicitude in customary coin. Since 1947, and especially in the last few years, the Board has issued a long series of decisions which, in terms of arrogant fact-distortion, questionable legal interpretation, and callousness toward due process requirements, at least equal and often surpass the worst that it had produced under the Wagner Act.[29]

Perhaps the outstanding historical example of such Board conduct is to be found in its decisions in the Kohler case. Since I have written a book[30] about the NLRB's first decision[31] in the case and an article[32] about the second,[33] I do not think it necessary to spend time and space on that affair here. Suffice it to say that, in my opinion, that litigation provides in itself sufficient basis for a re-evaluation by Congress of its grant of judicial power to the NLRB.

So disturbing has the Board's performance been that it seems increasingly to try the restraint of federal judges.[34] The federal circuit-court judges habitually bend over backwards in an effort to respect the limits on their reviewing power which Supreme-Court decisions and the statute to some extent impose. Judge Friendly's comment reflects the sentiment of a good many of his brethren on the federal bench and will be found repeated in one form or another in dozens of decisions each year. In short, the U.S. courts of appeals frequently enforce Board orders even when it is perfectly clear that, given a freer hand, they would vacate them.[35] In the opinion of easily a majority of the federal judges, I would say, the NLRB has a policy of its own which only accidentally intersects and coincides with the policies of Congress.

It would be inaccurate to conclude, however, that no vestige of Congress' policies survives today in labor relations law and practice. Those policies do survive to some extent. And in this fact resides another fact of significance to this inquiry into the separation of powers: Congress' labor policies survive in about the same proportion and to about the same extent as do the reviewing powers of the federal courts of appeals.

I turn now to consideration of the constitutional validity, the practical worth, and the consequences of Congress' having transferred so much judicial power from those courts to executive agencies.

III. "EXPERTISE," SEPARATION OF POWERS, AND DUE PROCESS

It is something said that, whatever their constitutional defects, quasi-judicial administrative tribunals are vital to good government because of the complexities of the modern world. One used to hear, too, that such tribunals are necessary in order to get speedy justice and broad-minded, flexible, sophisticated decisions. Lately, with NLRB and other administrative agencies demonstrating a truly remarkable talent for delay and for hide-bound mechanical decisions,[36] one does not hear the latter encomium of administrative agencies so much. But "expertise," one still hears, is as necessary in government as it is in the other vital aspects of advanced, intricate, delicately inter-dependent contemporary society.

According to this view it is unrealistic and "reactionary" to expect the regular courts either to possess, to develop, or consistently to exercise the requisite expertise in so specialized and complicated a field as, for example, labor relations. There a tribunal manned by experts is needed. One does not ask a general handyman to build or repair a computer. In the same way, a judge of general jurisdiction cannot be expected to perform well in the complex, specialized area of labor relations. There a specialized expert tribunal such as the National Labor Relations Board must do the job.

It will be observed that this rationale is built around two assumptions: (1) that labor relations are a distinct, inordinately complex field; (2) that a specially qualified agency is thus required to administer them.

It is true that the employer-employee relationship is distinct from such other relationships as husband-wife, parent-child, buyer-seller, contractor-subcontractor, government-person, and teacher-student. It is not self-evident, however, that the employer-employee (or union-employee or union-employer) relationship is either more sensitive, more complicated, or more critically a matter of public interest than those and other human relationships. Society is a sensitive complex of human relationships; all human relationships are relatively subtle and complicated. It is not possible to maintain a priori that labor relations are more so. Such an assertion has to be proved. No one has ever done so—probably because it would be impossible to do so.

Even if it were conceded for the sake of argument that labor relations are exceptionally sensitive and complex, it would not follow that—the nation's fundamental policies being what they are—a specialized agency of government is necessary. The fundamental policies of this nation call for the administration of labor relations mainly by employers and employees and, to some small degree, by trade unions and arbitrators. The more complex relationships become, indeed, the more necessary does it become to leave to individuals the freedom to adjust their own relationships. The effect of thoroughgoing regulation of complex relationships is only frustration for both the regulating body and the persons regulated. Regulating an infant is relatively easy; the child grows more difficult; the teen-ager almost impossible—all because the relationships have grown more complex. It is the nature and supreme advantage of a free society, as distinct from a command or totalitarian society, to leave the conduct of all human relations essentially to the persons immediately involved, or to their agents, subject only to general rules, equally applied.

Congress has followed this policy in the Labor Act. It has never empowered the Labor Board to administer labor relations (although that agency has frequently had to be reminded by the Supreme Court, by the U.S. Courts of Appeals, and by Congress of the limited reach of its commission). Congress has empowered the Labor Board and its General Counsel to administer the National Labor Relations Act, not the labor relations of the country.

The General Counsel's functions are mainly to decide which charges should be prosecuted and then to prosecute them. The functions of the Labor Board and its subordinates are (1) to conduct hearings; (2) to interpret and draw conclusions from written and oral evidence; (3) to apply Congress's law to the facts found in accordance with congressional intent; and (4) to issue appropriate orders.

No one has ever advanced a convincing reason for giving a prosecutional monopoly to a lawyer entitled "General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board" as against vesting this power, say, in the Department of Justice. Moreover, no one has explained why either policy or justice in labor law is served by denying private parties—employees, employers, or union officials—the power to prosecute their own cases which private parties are accorded under the antitrust laws. No one has even attempted to justify this—again probably because it would be impossible to do so.

On the contrary, the General Counsel's prosecutional monopoly works against both policy and justice. Denying persons the right to a day in court more markedly denies justice than does a denial of due process. It is a denial of all process. This denial cannot be justified on "policy grounds," either, for its effect has been and must continue to be to inhibit and frustrate the development of labor law.

As matters now stand only such developments occur as the General Counsel wishes; dozens of decisions could be cited to the effect that there is no appeal from a refusal by the General Counsel to issue a complaint. Without in any way impugning the good faith of the General Counsel, it remains self-evident that he and his limited personnel cannot possibly equal the range, the vigor, and the litigational fertility of the nation at large. Even if it be conceded, as I do, at least for the sake of argument, that the General Counsel's staff includes lawyers as learned and as clever as those in private practice, the fact remains that the latter are more numerous and more zealous to serve their clients. The General Counsel's professional monopoly should obviously be withdrawn.

If it is difficult to understand why the General Counsel should have a prosecutional monopoly, it is at least equally unobvious that human beings who become members of the National Labor Relations Board are more qualified to perform the judicial functions which Congress created in the National Labor Relations Act than are the men who occupy the federal bench. Conducting hearings, ruling on sufficiency of complaints and answers, admitting or excluding evidence, evaluating testimony, interpreting documents, drawing inferences, arriving at conclusions of fact of law, fashioning appropriate orders—these are all activities requiring a certain level of competence, training, and experience. The "man in the street" is not likely to carry out these functions very well without special training and experience.

The question, however, is not whether the NLRB is more qualified than the man in the street to carry out these functions. For the purposes of this investigation into the separation of powers, the main question must be whether Congress has a reasonable basis for delegating judicial powers to an administrative agency, rather than to the judges of the federal bench. Admitting that "expertise" is a good thing, we must then ask: expertise is what? If it is expertise in legal administration—in the arts and skills of judging—prima facie, at least, one would think that career-judges are the true experts.

In a period when principled analysis counted for more than it does in these "pragmatic" days, it would have been enough to point out that the members of the National Labor Relations Board are appointed for limited terms of office. That fact would alone serve to disqualify them for the exercise of any part, however small, of the judicial power of the United States. For the Constitution insists that the judicial power of the United States be exercised only by men appointed to the federal bench for life.

Footnotes at end of article.

The times being what they are, the analysis must extend beyond and behind the Constitutional standard, even though in doing so it will only confirm the acuteness and the wisdom of that standard. Two integrated inquires suggest themselves: (1) Are Board members and their subordinates better qualified than federal judges to carry out the judicial functions created by the Labor Act? (2) Are the congressional policies embodied in the Labor Act likely to be accepted with better grace and more faithfully effectuated by the Labor Board or by the federal courts?

1. No extensive "empirical research" is necessary in order to establish that the Labor Board members and their subordinates begin their careers with no significant training or experiential advantage over the men who are appointed to the federal bench. As a matter of fact, the only relevant specialist training for the functions under consideration is legal training. All federal judges nowadays, so far as I have been able to discover, are legally trained. Most Labor-Board members and personnel have likewise had legal training, although some have not. There is a stand-off here, and I doubt whether it could be resolved by reviewing the law-school records compiled by the judges and the Board people respectively.

As far as experience is concerned, it is quite probable that Labor Board personnel, if only for being younger on the whole, have had less general experience at the beginning of their Board careers than the federal judges (who come mainly to office after years of practice) have had in the beginning of their judicial careers. On the other hand, Labor-Board personnel, since their efforts are confined to the labor law field, tend to build a more concentrated and extensive experience in labor law much more quickly than the federal judges do.

Careless thinking might lead one to conclude from the foregoing that the Labor Board people soon acquire a significant advantage, even if they do not begin with one. More careful consideration leads to a different conclusion, however.

Of course a person specializing in labor law is likely to know more about that subject than the person who does not specialize in it. No court of general jurisdiction will ever be able to match a specialized court in the mastery of the minute detail of the substantive law in which the latter specializes.

It is a serious mistake, however, to regard this as a significant point. What we desire primarily in judges is not exhaustive mastery of the substantive details of any particular field of law. It is the job of the opposing lawyers to bring all the relevant law and doctrine to the court's attention.

A solid grasp of basic principles of law in the various fields is more than enough such equipment for any judge. What a democratic society wants essentially from its judges, however, is a complex of other qualities. It requires what it perhaps best comprehended within the term "judicial temperament": a strong but open mind; a habit of reserving judgment till all the facts are in and disinterestedly evaluated; a willingness to listen—really listen—to argument; patience; respect for the opinions of other judges; a good logical mind which will adequately distinguish the relevant from the irrelevant facts and the cogent from the illogical arguments; an inclination to start out every case believing that the facts, the law, and the arguments—not the identity of the parties—should determine the decision. There is no basis for the belief that NLRB members, trial examiners, or other Board personnel rank higher than the federal judges on this all-important standard of judicial temperament. Quite the contrary.

In a representative government, there is one more supremely desirable judicial quality. If representative government is to function properly, the judges must be satisfied to leave the policy-making to the legislature; they must be committed to interpreting and applying the statutes which the legislature has passed, not to competing with the legislature as a law-making, policy-making organ of government. For neither judges nor administrators can ever represent the nation and its people in the way that Senators and members of the House of Representatives do. It is physically impossible for judges and administrators to constitute themselves the deliberate and consultative micronism of the nation which the House and the Senate do without even thinking about it.

When judicial officers take on a legislative role, they make a mess all round. They produce neither good legislation nor good decisions. Litigation, the courtroom, and the judicial opinion are functionally neither adapted nor adaptable to either gathering the sense of the whole community or expressing it in legislative form. On the other hand, litigation, the courtroom, and the judicial opinion are the best means thus far devised for applying established law and policy to the facts of the individual dispute which every case or controversy involves.

This is why it is good for legislatures to stick to legislating and for judges to stick to judging. It may be all right for legislatures to care little about the facts of particular cases when they are contemplating general legislation. But the judicial officer who fails to attend excruciatingly to the facts of the particular case he is deciding, on the contrary, is fundamentally and dangerously untrue to his function and duty.

One of the characteristic defects of the NLRB is that it is continually forcing the facts to fit its predetermined policies. Instead of fitting Congress's law to the facts as they exist, the Board persistently manhandles the facts so that they will produce the results it wants. The Board wants every employee in the nation to wear a union label. If Congress says that employees need wear a union label only when it fits them, the Board does what it can to make a fit. If the facts don't fit, the Board will make them fit. If there are no material facts at all, the Board will frequently use adjectives to make up the deficiency. Thus in Rivers Mfg. Co., the trial examiner delivered himself of the following comments: "In this setting of intensive and extensive [sic] interference, restraint and coercion, the Respondent terminated the employment of nine employees . . . known by management to be union adherents . . . The evidence sustaining General Counsel's allegations that these October 2 discharges were designed to discourage further self-organization is overwhelming." [37]

After a painstaking examination of the entire record, Circuit Judge O'Sullivan concluded that the trial examiner's characterizations were not only exaggerations but "without foundation." "A right to infer," he said, "is not a right to create." [38]

The point is that it is unrealistic to expect patient, painstaking analysis of fact and application of existing law from committed ideologues; for they are interested more in molding the world to their desires than in doing justice in the immediate dispute. The closely related point is that such idealogues cannot be expected to subordinate their policy wishes to those of the legislative. Hence, if Congress wishes its policies to govern the country it must insist upon judges who are willing to confine themselves to judging and to leave the policy-making to Congress.

Some will perhaps challenge this view of the necessity of Congressional policymaking supremacy. We have heard a great deal of talk in recent years, for example, about the superior representative qualities of the presidency. However, disinterested analysis of the relevant facts must quickly dismiss such talk. As remarkable as the presidents of this country have been, it is impossible for any one man—even before being elected president—to equal Congress's representative capacity. And it is simply absurd to expect him to sustain a broadly representative character after he takes up the consuming burdens of office. No one man can even meet and know as many people in as many places as five or six hundred Congressmen and Senators can. Still less can he reconcile within himself the kind of consensus or compromise which is possible in a multitudinous consultative assembly originating in all the geographically distinct areas of which the country is composed.

If the President wished realistically to gather the consensus of the whole country on all issues, he would as a practical matter have available to him no better mechanism for doing so than the one already available in the House and the Senate. There is really a very peculiar meaning in the assertion that the President represents the whole country better than Congress does. Persons using such language mean that they have been able to convince the President of the worth of their proposal while Congress has remained unmoved. But when Congress remains unmoved—it being the genuine representative of the whole country—the meaning is that the whole country is not ready to endorse, as the President may be for his own reasons, the desires of the pressure group involved.

Many presidents have agonized over the "loneliness" of their position. This phenomenon, grown more frequent of late, is of potentially great significance to any study of the Separation of Powers. The lament grows out of the condition of executive power which, presumably, the person who gains the presidency has more or less actively sought. Executive responsibility must ultimately be concentrated in one person. In this country, with government grown to great, presidential responsibility absorbs as much time and energy as the incumbent is willing and able to give it. An executive decision always has to be made, one way or another, cleancut or ambiguous. There is no way in the world for the President to share his responsibility in the way that Senators and Representatives not only can do—but must.

This is not to say that Senators and Congressmen do not have to make "lonely" and difficult decisions with respect to their own personal choice of action. Of course they do, as all human beings must. But it is in the nature of legislation in a representative government that the responsibility for every legislative act is a well-divided and broadly shared responsibility, arrived at deliberatively—with each Congressman or Senator in a position to be fairly confident that his vote either reflects the majority sentiment of his constituency or at least does not violate that sentiment sufficiently to lose him his office. It is physically impossible for a single person over any sustained period, however delicately tuned his antennae, to maintain such rapport with the whole nation, especially when he has heavy executive responsibilities to dispatch. He can take only one position on an issue at a time. That is the ineluctable consequence of being a single human being. Five hundred or so elected representatives can take five hundred positions, and each, theoretically, may be satisfying his duty to his own constituency.

The merit of representative government in the form established by the Constitution of the United States lies mainly in its realistic response to such practical considerations. No better way to run a country in accordance with the dominant wishes of the community has as yet been discovered.

If it is true that the President—the outstanding politician of the country (I use the word with no pejorative intent)—cannot represent the sum of the country's policy wishes as well as the Congress does overall, it would seem to go without saying that no bureaucrat, no administrative agency, no judge or body of judges can do so. This is why, in a country which prides itself upon being a representative government, it is supremely desirable that anyone exercising judicial power be content to leave the policy- and law-making to Congress. For the alternative involves the abandonment of representative government and a substitution in its place of rule by the one or the few. In Aristotle's terminology, the commonwealth gives way to a democracy, and a democracy to tyranny.

If judicial temperament and a willingness to leave policy-making to the legislature are the two basic and reciprocal requirements for a proper exercise of judicial power, it is difficult to see how Labor-Board members and personnel qualify better than federal judges. On the contrary, a federal judgeship is far more likely to secure those qualities than is an administrative appointment. Consideration of our second basic question will further illuminate this matter.

2. That question is whether the Congressional policies embodied in the Labor Act and with them the supremacy of legislative policy-making are likely to be better enforced and preserved by the Labor Board or by the federal courts.

I happen to believe that, over the years, decisions of incomparably higher quality, greater fairness, and more cogency have been produced by the United States Courts of Appeals than by the National Labor Relations Board.[39] But it is not enough, for the purposes of this Subcommittee, to register the opinion that better decisions have come from the courts than from the Board. I assume that this Committee is interested in looking into the question whether there is something inherent in the character of federal judgeships or Board memberships on the basis of which a fair prediction about the future conduct of the respective incumbents can be made.

Human beings, customarily with legal training, man both the federal courts and the NLRB. We must assume, if we are to avoid interminable and inconclusive personality comparisons, that agency members and judges begin with equal moral and intellectual characteristics. The question then focuses on the respective institutional settings and the probable effects of those settings on the performance of their judicial duties.

IV. JUDICIAL COURTS VERSUS ADMINISTRATIVE COURTS: THE INSTITUTIONAL SETTINGS

The institutional setting of each member of the National Labor Relations Board is a five-year appointment to what is known as a quasi-judicial tribunal, located by law, fact, and tradition in the executive branch of government. Appointment is by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The duties, described above, are essentially judicial in character. One hears varying opinions, concerning whether or not the Board members should conceive of themselves as essentially policy-making participants in any current Administration, on the one hand, or judges on the other. The "Eisenhower Board" avowed and to some extent adopted a judicial stance; the "Roosevelt-Truman-Kennedy-Johnson" Boards, while still not entirely disavowing a judicial role, have on the whole adopted an essentially policy-making stance conformable to that of the Administration in power.

Federal judges also are appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate. To this extent, the institutional setting of federal judges and NLRB members is the same. But to this extent alone. No federal judge has ever asserted that his job is to effectuate the policies of a given executive administration. On the contrary, when federal judges discuss the question, their uniform affirmation is one of obedience to the Constitution and to the congressional intent expressed in valid legislation.

The Supreme Court of the United States has been accused of policy-making ambitions, both currently and in the past. Whether or not this Subcommittee or I credit such accusations is not material to the present inquiry. For no one can validly accuse the Supreme Court of a peculiar policy bias conceived and pursued essentially because that policy is favored by the incumbent administration.

Supreme-Court justices have been a constant source of surprise to the presidents who appointed them. Justice Holmes's contempt for antitrust law and policy—a shock to the President who appointed him—is only one example of a number of such cases. It is incorrect to believe that the present Supreme court, "activist" though it may well be called, is acting the way it is because it believes that the present or any past Administration wished it to act in that particular way.

We come, then, to the first of two sharp distinctions between membership in the NLRB and federal judicial office: the five-year terms of the former and the life tenure of the latter. The five-year term of office goes far toward insuring allegiance in each NLRB member to the Administration which appointed him, to the one with power to re-appoint him, or to both. There is no need to oversimplify the situation. Tradition may call for a "pro-union" Administration to appoint one or two "pro-employer" types to the Board. In such a case, the "pro-employer" Board member would be unfaithful to the Administration if he abandoned his former stance as a means of insuring reappointment. In order to keep the "bi-partisan" show going, he must maintain some semblance of the penchant which got him his appointment in the first place.

If a Board member wishes reappointment at the end of his five-year term, he must satisfy the Administration then in power that he can be relied upon to act in accordance with that Administration's labor-policy views, subject to the "bi-partisan" tradition. There is nothing sinister and nothing surprising about this. In the contrary, a given Administration has no basis for its appointments to the NLRB other than furtherance of its policies and political ambitions or payment of its political debts. Expecting an Administration which has gained power with the assistance of trade unions to appoint a Board which would deal as rigorously with unions as the law requires—that is as realistic as it would be to run for office on a platform which the voters demonstrably oppose.

It is true that a Board member is always in a position to "betray" the President who appointed him. The betrayal may even win him reappointment from a succeeding President who approves his new position. But this is of little significance. The fact remains that a majority of the Board will always be governed sooner or later by the political position of the Administration in power; five-year terms expire; then the Administration's labor policies reflect themselves in the new appointments. President Kennedy had a majority within a year or so of his accession.

It is possible that the Administration's labor policies will coincide precisely with those of the Congress which passed the legislation in question. Possible, but not likely. As time passes, the likelihood diminishes. An Act passed by Congress in 1947 is not likely to express exactly the policies that an Administration in 1967, or 1987, finds suited to its political and social objectives.

But even when Administration objectives coincide exactly with the legislatively expressed policies, it will be the Administration which controls the action of the quasi-judicial executive agency, not the legislation. It is important to bear this in mind because results in particular cases will be affected. Thus, though there may be a general policy, coincidence between the legislation and the Administration, the Administration, may still feel that in a particular case, for one reason or another, it is desirable that the impact of the legislation be softened, hardened, or redirected in some other way.

Our present structure of "administrative law" leaves plenty of room for this sort of thing. A busy General Counsel has to pick and choose the cases which he will prosecute. He cannot prosecute them all. Certainly he need not prosecute them all with equal vigor and persistence and acumen. After all, the main thing is to keep the staff busy. If it is kept busy in spite of the fact that one particular case is not prosecuted at all, or that it is put "on the back burner," what great harm has been done?

Or suppose the case is prosecuted so that it gets before the Board. Courts may not substitute their conclusions for those of the Board where there is substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole which supports the Board's finding. Not uncommonly the record as a whole will sustain contrary findings. In such a case, the reviewing court, if faithful to this basic principle of "administrative law," may not vacate the Board finding no matter which way it goes. Hence it is perfectly permissible for the Board to go either way. And the judge who keeps faith with the law—as most federal judges do—must enforce the Board order in either case. All this being true, the Board itself is in a position to do exactly what the General Counsel does in picking the cases to prosecute. It is in a position, in short, to make an exception whenever doing so is of great importance to the Administration of which it considers itself a part.

I am no muck-raker and do not wish to exaggerate the incidence of such conduct on the part of either the Board or its General Counsel. For the purposes of this Subcommittee, in any event, it is enough that such possibilities exist, even if they have never actually occurred. Indeed the analysis will proceed more disinterestedly and more expeditiously if it is realized that there is no necessity to establish that this sort of thing has or has not happened in any particular case.

For the major point in our inquiry is that nothing of the kind can reasonably be expected where judicial power is confined to men with life tenure who have been appointed to the insulated judicial department of government. If the Supreme Court is indeed an activist, consciously policy-making agency, rather than a genuine court of law, it is so because that is the way it conceives its function. If there is a flaw in the Court's position, that flaw is not a product of any defect in the Constitution, in the principle of the separation of powers, or in the institution of life tenure for judicial officers. It is a flaw, instead, in the conception of judicial office held by individual members of the Court. It is a product of their failure to understand the functional inadequacy of the court room as a political, policy-making institution, and the functional superiority of the courtroom, as an institution in which justice under law may be distributed among particular parties litigant on the basis of minute consideration of the particular facts and of the legal arguments which the adversary system is bound in individual cases to bring to the attention of the judges.

If misunderstanding and ineffective corrective measures are to be avoided, it is necessary to understand, as well as we can, what motivates the Supreme Court to take an activist, policy-making position. Of course, it is always possible to jump to the conclusion that the Court does not care about the Constitution; that the justices are arrogantly determined to follow their own will; that they are engaged in a completely extra-legal and extra-constitutional struggle for supreme power in the government of the

Footnotes at end of article.

United States. This is not only a possible position; in my opinion, there are occasions upon which it seems the most plausible explanation of certain decisions of the Court. As an example, I would cite the recent (1967) decision of a bare majority of the Court in the National Woodwork case.[40]

Mr. Justice Brennan wrote the opinion of the court for himself and Justice Warren, White, and Fortas. A majority was made by the special concurrence of Justice Harlan in the Brennan decision. Justices Black, Douglas, and Clark concurred in a dissenting opinion by Justice Stewart. With these dissenting justices I have concluded that Justice Brennan's opinion so blatantly flouted the clear meaning and intent of the statutory provision involved that the only possible explanation was a determination by the majority to challenge Congress' policy-making supremacy under the Constitution.[41] In my view, Justice Stewart was correct in calling Justice Brennan's opinion "a protracted review of legislative and decisional history in an effort to show that the clear words of the statute should be disregarded. . . ."[42]

However, I would remind the Subcommittee here of two points. The first is that Justice Brennan could not possibly have been meaning to carry favor with the Administration which appointed him; he was an Eisenhower appointee. Nor could he have been motivated by a desire to promote his own career by currying favor with the present Administration. There is nothing that the current Administration can do either to hurt him or harm him on the Court.

The second point to remember is that, no matter how blantantly a life-tenure justice may seem to misconstrue legislation, there is always, in the end, an objectively insoluble problem concerning motivation. We may eliminate economic insecurity where the judge has life-tenure and the position pays him enough to preclude ambition. We may eliminae vulgar corruption, owing to the traditions and the high dignity of the Court. We may eliminate light frivolity, for there is plenty of reason to believe that the justices take their role seriously. But when these and other such motivating factors are eliminated, it is still not possible for the external observer-analyst to be sure about the causal factor or factors which actually produced the judicial opinion in question. It could have been to trivial a thing as stupidity, a law clerk who did a fragmentary job of research among the authorities or in the record of the case, or an appealing argument on the wrong side, or simply the hard case which makes bad law.

It is best, then, to operate on the assumption that, however egregiously the justices may act in particular cases, they nevertheless perform their duties in good faith—by which I mean, in accordance with their conception of their role on the Court. Often, we must remind ourselves, the Court interprets Congress' statutes well and faithfully, reversing the NLRB in the process. Often, owing to the inherent ambiguities of language or to sloppy or evasive work in Congress, an interpretation can go either way, and the critic cannot complain with any great force merely because the Court has adopted an alternative which he would have rejected.

Moreover, with law professors in a state of great confusion over the judicial role with respect to statutory interpretation, it is easy to understand that at least some of the justices will share their confusion. A professor of law has recently published the following statement:

". . . the myth that the courts only follow the intent of Congress inhibits most judges from examining solutions worked out in other countries, even when Congress had no intent or when that intent was not to solve but to avoid the problem. Thus, the Court in the Lockout Cases condemned the NLRB for 'unauthorized assumption . . . of major policy decisions properly made by Congress,' and then fabricated a Congressional intent to support its own policy decision. The Court could have gained greater insight into the problem and made a more responsible decision if it had examined the alternative solutions from other countries; but that would require an open admission that the Court was making the policy decision which Congress had refused to made."[43]

The foregoing comment may be broken down as follows:

1. Courts do not merely follow the will of Congress.

2. They are policy-makers.

3. It is proper that they make policy.

4. Congress did not express a policy on the legality of collective-bargaining lockouts.

5. The Supreme Court made its own policies in the Lockout Cases, but it did so inadequately because it was afraid to admit that it was making policy which Congress had declined to make.

The first two statements are inaccurate, though not completely incorrect. The vast preponderance of federal judges other than Supreme-Court Justices not only say that they are bound by Congressionally declared policies but act in accordance with that declaration, subject to three qualifications: (a) sometimes statutory ambiguity or other deficiencies require the court to contribute something more than mere interpretation to the decision which it must reach; (b) at times a federal judge does play fast and loose with legal doctrine and statutory interpretation; (c) sometimes the court must follow an interpretation at variance with the plain meaning of the statute because the Supreme Court has already imposed such a variant. The latter is peculiarly relevant in labor law. A large proportion of Circuit-Court affirmances of NLRB decisions is owing to the fact that the Supreme Court has so often endorsed the NLRB's revisions of the Labor Act. After the Court has done so, the Circuit Courts of Appeals have no real alternative but to go and do likewise.

The third statement is not only incorrect, but seriously so. Aside from "gap-filling" and selection among alternatives where legislation is ambiguous, the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, act improperly when they make policy. They act improperly from all relevant points of view: from the point of view of personal morality; from the point of view of Constitutional legitimacy; and from the point of view of functional-practicality. All federal judges swear to uphold the Constitution as a prerequisite to their office. The Constitution (as well as the basic concept of representative government which underlies it) states that:

"All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives" For reasons already stated, no court of law can represent the nation adequately; confined to a particular dispute in the courtroom setting, broad policy-making by judges is bound to be abortive. The nation, the law, multitudes of persons, and the future of representative government in the United States—all are in a state of crisis today owing in no small part to the Supreme Court's assumption of policy-making and even constitution-making powers over the last thirty years or so.

The fourth and fifth statements are incorrect. Congress did not say in so many words that the collective-bargaining lockout was lawful. But such a lockout was plainly lawful at common law, and there was no language or no policy in the National Labor Relations Act from which an inference of Congressional determination to change the common law could properly or logically be drawn. On the contrary, there was much Congressional language from which the Court could—and did—infer that Congress intended to preserve the legality of the collective-bargaining (as contrasted to the coercive anti-union) lockout. The Supreme Court decisions in the Lockout Cases were manifestly correct interpretations and applications of Congressional intent. Moreover, to suggest that the Court should have referred to European experience in order to determine how to govern Americans demonstrates a doubly peculiar lack of understanding of the system of government of the United States. It fails to understand not only what representative government means, but also what the constituency is whose views and preferences are to be represented by government and reflected in law.

I have discussed the foregoing comment on judicial-policy-making power at some length because of the help it affords in understanding the policy-making penchant of the Supreme Court. The comment does not represent the aberrant view of a single law-school professor. It represents, to my personal knowledge, a substantial body of opinion among law teachers, and therefore of necessity among law students, practitioners, and even judges. It is really ingrained enough to be called an unreconciled contradiction in our legal tradition—one which can be removed only by spreading a better understanding of the meaning and the requirements of representative government and of the Constitution

We have come now to the second sharp distinction between the institutional framework of the federal judiciary and that of quasi-judicial administrative tribunals: the history and the traditions within which they respectively operate.

It would be a mistake to assume that an administrative agency such as the NLRB is something new, without history or tradition. The mistake is understandable because that history and that tradition are hidden and forgotten. The history and tradition which the NLRB carries forward today was rejected in the middle of the 17th Century in England. It was rejected on the basis of experience so repugnant, and so tragic for men who prized law and decency, that it could not be revived till consciousness of its terrible consequences had dimmed with the passage of more than 250 years.

I refer of course to the abolition in the 17th Century of such administrative tribunals as the Star Chamber and the Court of High Commission. Those agencies, like the NLRB, were rationalized as "expert" tribunals which could be relied upon to do "speedy justice," unhampered by the "technicalities" of the law courts, and obedient to the executive policies which parliament and the courts of law were frustrating.

The constitutional revolution which took place for a period of more than forty years in England during the 17th Century had two significant results, both relevant to our present inquiry: (1) the assertion of parliamentary policymaking supremacy, involving a radical reduction in the power of the executive; (2) the creation of a judiciary insulated from political pressures by life tenure in office, involving the abolition of all such quasi-judicial agencies as the Star Chamber.

Two great legal scholars—Sir Henry Sumner Maine and Professor William W. Crosskey—have demonstrated both broadly and in detail that the main features of the Constitution of the United States were the direct product of the English experience during the 17th Century.[44] It is impossible to read the Constitution against the background of that experience and come to any other rational conclusion. Article I gives all legislative policy-making powers to Congress: Article III gives the whole judicial power of the United States to life-tenure judges.

The result was to interrupt the history and the traditions of administrative courts. We had none for a long time, and even after the Interstate Commerce Commission was created at the end of the 19th Century, we still had little "administrative law" till the thirties. Few lawyers will now remember the names of the men who served in the Star Chamber or the Court of High Commission, if indeed those names were ever widely known. But neither will many lawyers remember the names of I.C.C. or F.T.C. or C.A.B. or N.L.R.B. members.

It seems to be in the nature of an administrative court to operate anonymously. Even today, NLRB decisions emerge anonymously. One is tempted to infer a lack of pride in or perhaps a hesitancy to assume responsibility for the NLRB's product. And the inference is strengthened by the fact that normally only dissenting or specially concurring opinions are signed by NLRB members.

The history and traditions of the federal judiciary are strikingly different. They trace directly back in an unbroken line to the great English chancellors and judges, even beyond the time when life tenure was accorded judges. It is a history full of shining examples of intellectual and moral courage—of judges who time after time vindicated the maxim, "let justice be done though the heavens fall." Roscoe Pound has described how the king's judges defied the king's will even though they served at the king's pleasure.[15] Their names are known; even in the Year Books the judges are identified. One does not need to be a legal scholar in order to recognize such names as Coke, Holt, and Mansfield, or Marshall, Story, Shaw, Field, Holmes, Brandeis, Cardozo, Jackson.

It is a serious shortcoming—a failure to grasp one of the powerful determinants of human action—to underrate the influence of such a tradition, especially in the law, where a judge's nose is rubbed willy nilly so often in what his predecessors have said or done.

That thinnest, most unperceptive and most inaccurately designated of all schools of legal thought—"legal realism"—holds that judges not only do but should decide cases in accordance with their own inner intimations of immortality. But the "legal realist" does not explain how a person trained in the law, acting in a living tradition, thinking, as he must, in the categories of thought which prevail in the law, can possibly hand down decisions outside that tradition and those categories. As Morris R. Cohen was fond of pointing out, the "realism" of the "legal realists," like that of positivists generally, is better called simple-mindedness. There are more things in heaven and earth than they, apparently, have ever dreamt of.

Asking a career, life-tenure judge to act in the fashion that "legal realism" suggests is the same as asking a person to write without the alphabet. The only thing produced is an unintelligble mess, and few judges are willing to befoul their tradition and the law books that way. And so most judges, especially those for whom judging is a lifetime career, tend after a while to settle themselves down into carrying on the great tradition of obedience to law as opposed to personal preference or political expediency.

Continuity, consistency, predictability—these are the values which most federal judges prize and which they try to achieve. In contrast, the field of "administrative law" presents a spectacle of violent change in the "law" with each change of Administration. Judges think that the function of law is to help the community as a whole by giving a firm standard to which persons in general may adjust their conduct without fear of finding, after they have acted on one legal assumption, that the law has been changed. Administrative agencies consider "law" only another tool with which to advance the interests and policies of the Administration in power.

I remind the Subcommittee of the vicious cunning illustrated by the Bryant Chucking Grinder case.[16] The "Eisenhower Board" had held that unfair practice charges should not be allowed to relate back to pre-election conduct. The rule made good sense. A party should not consent to an election when he means to challenge it thereafter because of pre-election conduct. However, the "Kennedy Board," obviously for political reasons, found the rule unacceptable and simply reversed it. In so doing, it laid the basis for giving unions exclusive bargaining status and for imposing the duty to bargain on employers in hundreds of cases—in spite of the fact that the employees in those cases had, in secret-ballot elections, rejected collective bargaining.

Courts do make and change law to some extent. Unfortunately, as we have seen, they sometimes do those things even when the existing law is clear enough so that they are not required to do so by the necessity of deciding the case before them. Contrary to academicians of the kind I have mentioned above, there is no justification for such conduct. On the other hand, it is well to understand two things about it. First, the phenomenon is confined to relatively few judges, mainly on the Supreme Court. Second, it creates a power struggle between those few judges, on one side, and Congress, on the other; it does not necessarily align the judicial power with the executive power; and thus does not create so dangerous a threat to the principle of the separation of powers and to congressional policy-making supremacy as does the grant of judicial power to an executive agency.

Judicial power is the "weakest" of the three aspects of governmental power. It controls by itself neither men, nor guns, nor money, nor votes. If Congress did not keep itself to busy bootlessly trying to legislate this nation into a paradisial state, it could without too much trouble keep the Supreme Court vividly aware of its inherent weakness. If for just a few years Congress would police Supreme Court decisions—instantly responding to so blatant an example of statutory misconstruction as occurred in National Woodwork by a suitable statutory amendment—even the dullest or the most arrogant Supreme Court justice would learn that he was not commissioned by the Constitution with the supreme and autocratic power which some of the justices have arrogated to themselves.

That would be a troublesome and an annoying job for Congress; an unnecessary one, too, since the Justice ought to know better, even if the professoria do not. But at least it is practical and possible for Congress to control the Supreme Court. It is a small body, turning out a limited number of decisions. In the last resort, Congress could simply take away much of its appellate jurisdiction without doing irreparable injury to the nation.

In contrast, the job of policing and controlling the activities of administrative tribunals is very nearly hopeless. There are so many. They do so many things. They grind out so many decisions. Their activities are as often off the record as on. The confusion between their powers and those of the reviewing courts creates an infinity of problems in itself. Allocating responsibility is extremely difficult. For example, the NLRB constantly contends that it must be doing a good job because the Courts of Appeals enforce a vast preponderance of Board orders. But the Courts of Appeals must enforce most Board orders because the substantial evidence rule ties their hands; moreover, by now, with the Supreme Court's support, the Board has the bulk of the substantive law under the statute in a posture such that it can write decisions pretty much at will, no matter what the facts are.

CONCLUSION

Congress's policy-making legislative supremacy, and with it this country's hope for an effectively operating representative government, is endangered by the merging of judicial power into such executive agencies as the National Labor Relations Board.

Delegating judicial power to an administrative agency is both unconstitutional and impractical. It is unconstitutional because the Constitution confines the judicial power of the United States to an independent judicially composed of life-tenure incumbents. It is impractical because competent judging cannot be expected from limited-tenure political appointees who operate outside the long and sustained judicial tradition of subservience to law rather than to political exigency. The principal argument in favor of specialized quasi-judicial administrative tribunals is based upon an erroneous and deceptive conception of "expertise." The relevant "expertise" must be in the art of judging. The real experts in that art are the judges who sit on courts of general jurisdiction.

Creating specialized quasi-judicial administrative courts, subject to fragmentary and limited judicial review, produces neither expert nor expeditious judicial administration. It produces instead, uncontrollable confusion. Out of that confusion, the executive branch emerges with precisely the concentration of governmental power which the outstanding achievement of the United States Constitution—the principle of separation of powers—was designed to disperse. As Thomas Hobbes said, liberty is fragmented power. The result today of re-concentrating power is a badly governed country. Tomorrow, if history is any guide, we shall have tyranny.

The process has gone far already in the field of labor policy. Although these matters are hard to quantify with any precision, in my judgment the Labor Board has managed to gather a preponderance of the policy-making power in its hands, together with executive and judicial power. Congress will to assert its Constitutional power must not be weakened by doubts of its functional and representational superiority as legislator and policy-maker for the nation. It is nonsense to hold that the President or his bureaucracy better represent the nation. It is equal nonsense to believe that courts or administrative agencies can isolate the consensus of the community into a set of coherent basic policies better than Congress can.

If Congress wishes to escape the fate of the British House of Lords and to preserve the representative character of this government, it must respect and enforce the principle of the separation of powers. This means that Congress must repeal its delegation of judicial power to the National Labor Relations Board and re-vest that power in the federal courts.

Problems will remain. Some judicial incumbents are unable to distinguish judicial activity from legislative activity even when the two are clearly distinguishable, let alone when, as often happens, it is difficult to distinguish them. Moreover, some judicial incumbents believe that judicial power is tantamount to legislative power, at least so long as they can get away with it. Ultimately, however, it is a simpler matter for Congress to correct such judicial mistakes and to subdue such power-lust in judges than it is to maintain its position against a multipowered executive.

So, even if Congress, respecting the Constitution, should confine power to the federal judges, it will have to keep a wary eye on its storehouse of legislative power. Raids by the other branches can be expected. But this is inherent in the nature of men and things. It is not only for liberty that the price is eternal vigilance.

APPENDIX

U.S. Constitution, Art. III:

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

"The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. . . ."

The Federalist, No. 78:

". . . The standard of good behavior for the continuance in office of the judicial magistracy, is certainly one of the most valuable of the modern improvements in the practice of government. . . . (I)t is the best expedient which can be devised in any government, to secure a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws.

". . . For I agree that 'there is no liberty, if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers.' . . . that as, from the natural feebleness of the judiciary, it is in continual jeopardy of being overpowered, awed, or influenced by its coordinate branches; and that as nothing can contribute so much to its firmness and independence as permanency in office, this quality may therefore be justly regarded as an indispensable ingredient in its constitution, and, in a great measure, as the citadel of the public justice and the public security.

". . . Periodical appointments, however regulated, or by whomsoever made, would, in some way or other, be fatal to their necessary independence If the power of making them was committed either to the Executive or legislature, there would be danger of an improper complaisance to the branch which possessed it . . . if to the people. . ., there would be too great a disposition to consult popularity, to justify a reliance that nothing would be consulted but the Constitution and the laws"

[3] Ibid. And see Sec. 9(c) and Sec. 10(b) and (c) of the Act as amended. An amendment to 10(b) is typical. It exhorted the Board to follow the rules of evidence and procedure prevailing in the federal district courts, but only "so far as practicable."

[4] The U.S. Court of Appeals cannot vacate NLRB findings of fact unless there is no substantial evidence in the record considered as a whole to support those findings. Cf. Section 10(e) of the Act and Universal Camera Corp. v. NLRB. 340 U.S. 474 (1951). Obviously circuit judges will vary considerably in both interpreting and exercising such reviewing power as this necessarily vague standard imposes. Cf. the varying views of Judges Knoch and Schnackenberg in Lincoln Mfg. Co. Inc. v. NLRB, 55 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12044 (7th Cir. 1967). With Judge Hays' view in Bryant Chucking Grinder Co. v. NLRB, 56 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12344 (2d Cir 1967), compare that of Judge Anderson, dissenting in the same case. With Judge Bryan's opinion compare that of Judge Boreman in NLRB v. Dove Coal Co., 54 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11604 (4th Cir. 1966).

[5] I have discussed the evolution of Congressional labor policy at greater length in The Labor Policy of the Free Society at p. 125 et seq. (Ronald Press, 1957).

[6] For particularly able criticisms of the Board's distortion of the Congressional policies, see the notes: Card Checks and Employee Free Choice, 33 U. Chi. L. Rev. 387 (1966); Union Authorization Cards, 75 Yale L. J. 805 (1966).

[7] ILGWU Local 57 v. NLRB; Garwin Corp. v. NLRB, 54 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11664 (D.C. Cir. 1967), opinion by Burger, J., Bastian J., concurring; McGowan, J., dissenting on the critical issue.

[8] Judge McGowan dissented on the ground that the Board, "if it is to mediate between clashing interests with moderation and restraint, must have scope for inventiveness and experiment." Ibid., at pp. 18084–85. This is about as close as one normally comes to an explanation of the rationale which affirms the existence and endorses the exercise of policymaking discretion in the Board.

[9] The outstanding example of the Board's insistence that employers must make concessions to the union's demands (concessions to employees and obvious good-faith intent to reach an agreement not being enough) is the General Electric case, 150 NLRB No. 36 (1964).

[10] For typical examples of NLRB decisions requiring concessions from employers as an aspect of the duty to bargain, see California Girl, Inc., 129 NLRB No. 21 (1960); Cummer-Graham Co., 122 NLRB No. 134 (1959); Fetzer Television, Inc., 131 NLRB No. 113 (1961); James Rubin, 155 NLRB No. 37 (1965). The Board rarely reveals the facts in its decisions, tending as a rule simply to endorse the findings made by the trial examiner in his frequently prolix reports, and the reader is accordingly required to piece out the basis of the holding.

[11] Cf. United Steelworkers v. NLRB (Porter Co.), 56 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12332 (D.C. Cir. 1967) (Miller, J., dissenting) and the same case at an earlier stage: 53 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11238 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[12] I cite the following cases as a mere cross section of decisions in which the U.S. courts of appeals have found more or less serious shortcomings in the Board's handling of fact of law. In some cases, the court completely denied enforcement; in others, partly. The classification is in the numerical order of the circuits: Caribe General Electric Co. v. NLRB, 53 CCH Lab. Cas. 11094 (1st Cir., 1966); NLRB v. Purity Foods, Inc., 55 CCH Lab. Cas. 11896 (1st Cir. 1967); Cooper Thermometer Co. v. NLRB, 55 CCH Lab. Cas. 11863 (2d Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Nichols, 55 CCH Lab. Cas. 12016 (2d Cir. 1967); Firestone Synthetic Fibers Co. v. NLRB, 55 CCH Lab. Cas. 11783 (4th Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Logan Packing Co.; 56 CCH Lab. Cas. 12278 (4th Cir. 1967); Home Town Foods, Inc. v. NLRB, 55 CCH Lab. Cir. 1967); Clothing Workers v. NLRB, 53 CCH Lab. Cas. 11335 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

[13] Section 8 (a) (1)–(5) defines employer unfair practices; Section 8 (b) (1)–(7) defines roughly parallel or analogous unions unfair practices Section 8 (c)—(f) establish certain principles and provides for certain types of rules applicable to both unions and employers.

[14] See the cases cited in note 12, supra.

[15] Documentation of this assertion is beyond the scope of this paper. The process has been too long and too tortured for any kind of brief treatment. I have, however, written two books which demonstrate in painstaking detail how—contrary to Congressional intent—the Board has liberated unions from any serious control by the NLRA. See: How the NLRB Repealed Taft-Hartley (Labor Policy Assn., 1958); and Power Unlimited: The Corruption of Union Leadership (Ronald Press, 1959. [34] In NLRB v. Purity Foods, Inc., 55 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11896 at page 18952 (1st Cir. 1967), Judge Woodbury said after reviewing the testimony: "The Board's conclusion to the contrary flies in the face of reality." This is among the milder of the many critical references which circuit judges continue to make to NLRB findings. In NLRB v. Getlan Iron Works, Inc., 55 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11950 at page 19116 (2d Cir. 1967), Judge Feinberg said: "Because this is one of those instances where we find a lack of substantial evidence to support one of the Board's key findings, we decline to enforce the order to bargain and remand for further evidence." I doubt that Judge Feinberg could find any considerable number of other federal judges who share his confidence in the Board's fact-finding.

[35] Year after year numerous court of appeals decisions contain the following observation in one or another form: ". . . we have no hesitancy in saying that were we the fact finders we would have difficulty finding support for the charges of unfair labor practices." NLRB v. Witbeck, 56 CCH

Lab. Cas. ¶ 12148 (6th Cir. 1967). See also: Int. Tel. & Tel. v. NLRB, 56 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12101 at page 19643 (3rd Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Plymouth Cordage Co., 56 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 12135 (5th Cir. 1967); NLRB v. Elco Corp., 55 CCH Lab. Cas. ¶ 11898 (9th Cir. 1967), where the court said: "Had this court been called upon to pass originally on the merits of this case, we might have disagreed with the ultimate conclusion of the Board."

[36] It took the NLRB fifteen years to bring the Mastro Plastics case to a conclusion. Cf. NLRB v. Mastro Plastics Corp., 354 F. 2d 170 (2d Cir. 1965). The excuse proffered by this "expert" agency: a shortage of competent personnel.

[39] I believe it would be very instructive for the Subcommittee to undertake a comparison of the court decisions cited in note 12 with the NLRB decisions which they reviewed. I have done so and have been greatly impressed with the acumen, the intellectual flexibility, and the large-mindedness of the judges as compared with the contrary characteristics in the NLRB decisions or trial-examiner reports. But for the reviewing power of the federal courts, I am convinced that we should be experiencing in labor law today a succession of travesties of justice such as has not been seen heretofore in either England or America.

S. ——

A bill to insure the separation of Federal powers by amending the National Labor Relations Act to provide for trial of unfair labor practice cases in the United States district court, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3(d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is hereby repealed. This section shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the date of enactment of this Act.

SEC. 2. Section 4(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "and the General Counsel of the Board" in the first sentence; by striking out ", examiners," in the second sentence; and by striking out the fourth and sixth sentences.

SEC. 3. Section 8(b)(5) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(5) to require of employees covered by an agreement authorized under subsection (a)(3) the payment, as a condition precedent to becoming a member of such organization, of a fee in an amount which is excessive or discriminatory under the circumstances, considering, among other relevant factors, the practices and customs of labor organizations in the particular industry, and the wages currently paid to the employees affected;".

SEC. 4. Section 9(c)(2) of such Act is amended by striking out "section 10(c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "the provisions of section 10 in effect at the time the order was issued".

SEC. 5. Section 9(d) of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever the validity of a certification of a bargaining representative by the Board under this section is in issue in a proceeding before a court under section 10, the clerk of the court shall notify the Board of that fact. Within fifteen days after the date such notice is received the Board shall file such certification, together with the record on which it was based, with the court."

SEC. 6. Section 10 of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"PREVENTION OF UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

"SEC. 10. (a) The district courts of the United States, the district court of the Virgin Islands, and the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone shall have jurisdiction, as provided in this section, to prevent any person from engaging in any unfair labor practice (listed in section 8) affecting commerce.

"(b) Any person aggrieved by any such unfair labor practice may, within six months after the date on which such unfair labor practice occurred, either (1) file and prosecute a complaint in any court specified in subsection (a) having jurisdiction of the parties, or (2) file a charge of such unfair labor practice with the United States attorney for the appropriate district and request him to file and prosecute such a complaint. Whenever a person aggrieved by an unfair labor practice is prevented by reason of service in the Armed Forces from filing a charge or complaint he may do so within six months after the date of his discharge.

"(c) Whenever a charge is filed with a United States attorney under this section, he shall promptly notify the person against whom such charge is made. Within a reasonable time thereafter, he shall file a complaint with the appropriate court and prosecute such complaint, in the name of and on behalf of the person who filed the charge, unless he determines that the charge is frivolous, or otherwise without basis in law or fact, in which case he shall promptly notify the parties of such determination. After receiving such notice, the charging party may file and prosecute a complaint under subsection (b) on his own initiative; and the period beginning with the date on which he filed the charge with the United States attorney, and ending with the date on which he received such notice, shall not be counted in determining whether the six-month period specified in subsection (b) has expired. The United States attorney shall give priority to charges of unfair labor practices within the meaning of paragraph (4) (B) or (C) of section 8(b) over all other unfair labor practice charges filed with him.

"(d) Proceedings under this section shall be tried by the court without a jury. The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure shall apply in each such proceeding, except as otherwise provided in this section. In any case in which the pleadings present issues of fact, the court may appoint a master and the order of reference may require the master to submit with his report a recommended order. The master shall be compensated by the United States at a rate to be fixed by the court, and shall be reimbursed by the United States for necessary expenses incurred in performing his duties under this section. Any court before which a proceeding is brought under this section shall advance such proceeding on the docket and expedite its disposition.

"(e) The court may grant such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems appropriate pending final disposition of any proceeding under this section, but only after publicly hearing testimony of witnesses (with opportunity for cross-examination) in support of the allegations of a complaint made under oath, and testimony in opposition thereto, if offered; and only after findings of fact by the court to the effect—

"(1) that one or more acts constituting an unfair labor practice have been committed and will be continued unless restrained;

"(2) that substantial and irreparable injury to the complainant will follow;

"(3) that as to each item of relief granted greater injury will be inflicted by the denial of relief than will be inflicted by the granting of relief; and

"(4) that complainant has no adequate remedy at law.

The Act of March 23, 1932, entitled 'An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes' shall not apply to any proceedings under this section, except that section 10 of such Act, providing for expeditious review of temporary injunctions, shall apply with respect to any temporary relief or restraining order issued under this section.

"(f) If the court finds that any person named in the complaint has engaged in or is engaging in any unfair labor practice as charged in the complaint, the court shall enjoin such person from engaging in such unfair labor practice, and shall order such person to take such affirmative action, including reinstatement of employees with or without back pay (but not including the payment of damages in any other form), as may be necessary to enforce compliance with the provisions of this Act which such person is found to have violated. Where an order directs reinstatement of an employee, back pay shall be required of the employer, or the labor organization, or both, in such proportion as the court shall assess responsibility for the discrimination suffered by him. No order of the court shall require the reinstatement of any individual as an employee who has been suspended or discharged, or the payment to him of any back pay, if such individual was suspended or discharged for cause. In determining whether a violation of section 8(a)(1) or section 8(a)(2) has occurred, the same rules of decision shall apply irrespective of whether the labor organization affected is affiliated with a labor organization national or international in scope.

"(g) For the purposes of this section courts shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, (2) in any district in which its officers or agents are engaged in promoting or protecting the interests of employee members, or (3) in any district in which the unfair labor practice is alleged to have occurred. The service of legal process upon such officer or agent shall constitute service upon the labor organization and make such organization a party to the suit."

SEC. 7. Section 11 of such Act is amended by striking out "and section 10" in the matter preceding paragraph (1); by striking out "or proceeded against" in the first sentence of paragraph (1); and by striking out "Complaints, orders." in paragraph (4) and inserting in lieu thereof "Orders".

SEC. 8. Section 14(c) of such Act is hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. (a) Any proceeding under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act which is pending before the National Labor Relations Board on the date of enactment of this Act shall be continued by the Board if the hearing provided for in subsection (b) of such section, as in effect immediately prior to the enactment of this Act, has been completed, and if, within thirty days after the date of enactment of this Act the person aggrieved by the unfair labor practice in question requests the Board to continue the proceeding. Upon request of any such person, the appropriate United States attorney shall appear and represent such person in proceedings under this subsection before the Board and the courts. The Board shall act in such proceeding, and its action may be enforced or reviewed by the courts, in the same manner and with the same effect as if this Act had not been enacted, except that—

(1) the person requesting continuation of the proceeding, or the appropriate United States attorney, shall be substituted for the General Counsel in proceedings before the Board;

(2) any enforcement proceeding under section 10(e) shall be instituted by the party seeking enforcement of the Board's order, or the appropriate United States attorney, and thereupon the Board shall certify and file in the court a transcript of the entire record in the proceedings;

(3) the Board shall not appear in any proceeding under section 10(e) or 10(f); and

(4) if the court orders additional evidence to be taken in any proceeding under section 10(e) or 10(f), it shall be taken before a master designated by the court; the master shall be compensated by the United States at a rate to be fixed by the court, and shall be reimbursed by the United States for necessary expenses incurred in performing such duties.

(b) Where the Board has issued an order under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act before the date of enactment of this Act, a proceeding in court for the enforcement or review of such order may be instituted after such date in the same manner and with the same effect as though this Act had not been enacted, except that the provisions of paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (a) of this section shall apply to such proceedings.

(c) Any proceeding under section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act which is pending in any court on the date of enactment of this Act shall be continued as if this Act had not been enacted, except that after the effective date of section 1 an attorney employed by the Board and designated by the Board for the purpose shall be substituted for the General Counsel.

(d) Where a charge of an unfair labor practice is pending before the National Labor Relations Board on the date of enactment of this Act, and the hearing provided for in section 10(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as in effect immediately prior to the enactment of this Act, has not been completed, and the time limit provided for in section 10(b) of such Act, as amended by this Act, for filing a charge or complaint based on the same acts has expired, a charge or complaint may nevertheless be filed under such section at any time within thirty days after the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWER. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Texas agree with the Senator from North Carolina that section 7 of the Taft-Hartley Act was designed to give employees in our industries a freedom from coercion on the part of management and also a freedom from coercion on the part of unionism?

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct. That is my interpretation. And I think this is buttressed by the fact that section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act afford permission and authorization to the States to enact so-called right-to-work laws which prohibit closed shops.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, does not the Senator agree with the Senator from North Carolina that section 7 of the Taft-Hartley Act was intended to give an employee who happened to be a member of a union an absolute right to participate in union activities and also a freedom to refrain from so doing?

Mr. TOWER. That is my interpretation.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Texas if the National Labor Relations Board in the first instance and the Supreme Court of the United States in the last instance by a divided vote in the Allis-Chalmers case did not absolutely nullify the provision of section 7 which undertook to secure the freedom of employees from union coercion?

Mr. TOWER. I believe the Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Did not that decision say that an employee could be penalized and punished by the union for exercising a right clearly given him by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. TOWER. The eminent former jurist from North Carolina is absolutely correct.

Mr. ERVIN. I ask the Senator from Texas if he does not agree with the Senator from North Carolina that the labor law, as contained in the Wagner law and the Taft-Hartley Act and the Griffin-Landrum amendments of 1957, is not unique in that it denies every one of the 200 million Americans who may be injured by an unfair labor practice as defined in the law any remedy in the courts or before the National Labor Relations Board unless he can persuade the general counsel to file an unfair labor charge?

Mr. TOWER. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. ERVIN. No matter how much an individual may be injured by an unfair labor practice as defined in the law, he is denied all right to seek relief for himself, and the only way he can obtain any relief is to persuade general counsel to file an unfair labor practice charge in his behalf.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct because an individual has no standing before them.

Mr. ERVIN. And that is a violation of the boasted principle of our law that there is no wrong without a remedy.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is absolutely correct. That is a clear denial of due process.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator's remarks and the exhibits he offers it is the Senator's purpose to amend the present law so as to provide that Federal courts shall have jurisdiction of the trial of cases involving unfair labor practice charges.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is absolutely correct. What it would do actually would be to restore to the courts the jurisdiction the courts possessed prior to the enactment of the law establishing the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, the Federal courts were denied a large part of their equity jurisdiction in labor cases by what is called the Norris-LaGuardia Act on the theory that there should be an end to government by injunction.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. And at the time of passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, we had no legislation from Congress defining what are and what are not unfair labor practices.

Mr. TOWER. Would the Senator kindly repeat that? I did not hear him.

Mr. ERVIN. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed before the Wagner Act and before there was any congressional legislation defining what constituted unfair labor practices. Is that not correct?

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Would not the Senator from Texas agree with the Senator from North Carolina that the great outcry which preceded the passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act and resulted in its passage was that the judges were, in effect, manufacturing law because the things that people were punished for in those days with respect to violations of injunctions were orders made by Federal judges without the guidance of congressional enactment?

Mr. TOWER. If I remember my history correctly, the Senator is absolutely right.

Mr. ERVIN. Since that time we have had passage of labor legislation embodied in the Wagner Act, the Taft-Hartley Act, and in the Griffin-Landrum amendments of 1957. And the legislation now in existence defines what acts or omissions constitute unfair labor practices.

Mr. TOWER. I agree. I concur that there is now and has been enacted since the Norris-LaGuardia Act a substantial corpus of law on labor policy. I do not think that anyone can make the charge that the court would be placed in the position of legislating.

Mr. ERVIN. That is the point I was trying to make. The bill of the Senator would be designed to put the enforcement of these provisions of labor law defining unfair labor practices within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and the Federal courts would be permitted to try the cases.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct. It would not change the substance of existing law, but would simply change the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board to the Federal district court.

Mr. ERVIN. And in view of the fact that these labor practices are now defined by Federal law, the conditions which existed prior to the Norris-LaGuardia Act or in the days of government by injunction, no longer exist.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. Can the Senator from Texas think of any reason why a Federal judge is not as competent to try a case involving a question whether an unfair labor practice has been committed in violation of an act of Congress as he is to try any other case based on an act of Congress?

Mr. TOWER. As I said earlier in my remarks, I can see no reason why an unfair labor practice could be singled out as requiring expertise by judges when judges are called upon to pass upon all manner of technical questions.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, on page 3 of the proposed bill, it provides beginning on line 8:

Any person aggrieved by any such unfair labor practice may, within 6 months after the date on which such unfair labor practice occurred . . . file and prosecute a complaint in any court specified in subsection (a) having jurisdiction of the parties . . .

As I construe that provision of the proposed bill, it would restore to all Americans the right to go into court and protect themselves against unfair labor practices as defined by the acts of Congress.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. ERVIN. And they would no longer be denied any relief for the injuries they suffer because of the refusal of the General Counsel to act.

Mr. TOWER. The Senator is correct. I do not see how anyone could oppose this legislation because it affords greater protection for a greater number of people.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator's proposed bill merits the most serious study by Congress.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I wish to thank my distinguished friend from North Carolina for adding so much to the dialog on this question with regard to taking the jurisdiction of unfair labor practice cases away from the NLRB and putting it in the district courts. The distinguished Senator from North Carolina is a jurist with a wide background and great experience in labor law, and he has added greatly to what I consider to be the extremely cogent arguments for the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the Senator from Texas may be extended for 2 additional minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TOWER. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, I wish to commend the Senator from Texas for making a very important statement this morning and focusing attention upon the need to do something about the National Labor Relations Board, an agency of Government, of which the junior Senator from Michigan has been critical for a long time. Let me add that I have been critical of the Board under Republican as well as Democratic administrations.

This agency of Government, over the years, has been too much subjected to political and other pressures as is seeks to perform what is essentially a judicial function. The terms of the Board members are short; in too many instances they have not been selected because of legal or judicial qualification. As a result, such study as I have given to this subject over the years indicates to me that, generally speaking, the NLRB has not operated as a court or judicial body, as it should.

As the Senator from Texas knows, over a number of years I have introduced legislation which would abolish the National Labor Relations Board and set up in its place a U.S. Labor Court patterned after the U.S. Tax Court.

For various reasons which I do not have time to discuss this morning, I would prefer the reform route which I have proposed. However, I should like to indicate to the Senator from Texas that his proposal is certainly preferable to what we have now. And if a choice were to be made between continuing the present system or adopting his suggestion, I would certainly favor the proposal of the Senator from Texas.

I would suggest for a number of reasons that it would be well for committee consideration to be given to both reform proposals: The one offered by the Senator from Texas and the one offered by the Junior Senator from Michigan.

Again, I commend the Senator from Texas for his initiative and his discussion of this very important subject.

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Michigan, who is the author of some of the most significant labor legislation on the statute books today. I also express to him that I am openminded enough on the subject to be able to consider more than one approach. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

THE PHILIPPINES—A REPORT FROM THE GENERAL ACCOUNTING OFFICE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, last September and October the Subcommittee of the Foreign Relations Committee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad, which I have the honor to chair, held executive hearings on U.S. security agreements and commitments in the Philippines.

After some discussion with the Department of State, it was agreed that a censored version of these hearings would be published, but not released until after the Philippine elections in November.

This was done in order to avoid any possibility that these hearings might in any way affect the outcome of those elections.

In the course of the hearings, the subcommittee had occasion to inquire into the Philippine Civic Action Group in Vietnam, or PHILCAG as it is popularly known; and it was brought out that the PHILCAG's maximum strength had been 2,200. By the time of the hearings however, that number had been reduced to approximately 1,500.

It was also brought out that total Philippine casualties in Vietnam had amounted to eight killed and 17 wounded. The PHILCAG force has since been withdrawn from Vietnam.

It was also brought out, in sworn testimony, that the President of the Philippines accepted from the United States the "equipment for PHILCAG and the special overseas allowance for PHILCAG over and above their regular pay," and a table was furnished the subcommittee which showed that this special overseas allowance paid by the United States ranged from $210 a month for a brigadier general to $33 a month for a private.

In all, the total costs of PHILCAG to the United States were listed as $38.8 million, including supplies furnished in Vietnam as well as those "special allowances."

After the subcommittee's hearings were published, the Philippine presidential press office issued a statement, as reported in the U.S. press of November 19 and 20, which said:

> The Philippines has received no fee nor payments of "any kind" in support of the PHILCAG, or its personnel, nor has there been any grant given in consideration of sending the PHILCAG to Vietnam.

This statement raised a clear and unavoidable question as to whether the U.S. officials who had testified under oath before the subcommittee were guilty of perjury; and in fairness to these officials, we felt we had to pursue the matter further. We, therefore, wrote to the Comptroller General on November 26, asking him to make a detailed study of the payments that had been discussed before the subcommittee.

On February 19, we received an interim report from the Comptroller General classified secret; and we have now received a further unclassified report from him which is based on information obtained by him from unclassified sources.

I ask unanimous consent that our letter to the Comptroller General of November 26 and his letter of March 21 be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1 and 2.)

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, let us at this time note five points:

First. The Comptroller General confirms that the "quid pro quo" assistance given to the Philippine Government was substantially as described before the subcommittee.

Second. Other forms of military and economic assistance to the Philippine Government were increased during the period of the PHILCAG commitment to Vietnam.

Third. The United States made quarterly payments to the Secretary of National Defense of the Philippines. Most of these were in the form of U.S. Treasury dollar checks, endorsed with a signature which appears to be that of Ernesto S. Mata, the Philippine Secretary of National Defense, and which were deposited in the Philippine Veteran's Bank, usually the Camp Aguinaldo branch. We have photostatic copies of some of these checks.

Fourth. The Comptroller General was unable to determine whether the PHILCAG troops actually received the per diem and overseas allowances which were used to compute the U.S. quarterly payments to the Philippines. The Comptroller General also reports that "no information was required of, or received from, the Philippine Government on the disposition of these funds paid to them by the United States."

Fifth. Finally, the Comptroller General reports that his delay from November to March in responding to our inquiry was due to the fact that his work was "seriously hampered and delayed by the reluctance" of the Departments of State and Defense to give him access to the documents, papers, and records which he considered pertinent.

Mr. President, our correspondence with the Comptroller General speaks for itself. We only want to add that it is almost inconceivable the U.S. Government would get itself into a position where it pays money to foreign governments, or anybody else, without requiring information on the disposition of those funds, and also in a position where it refuses to furnish information about expenditures to the Comptroller General, who is an agent of the Congress which, in turn, holds, or at least is supposed to hold the purse strings on all U.S. expenditures.

NOVEMBER 26, 1969.

Hon. ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States,
General Accounting Office,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STAATS: In the course of the hearings held by the Subcommittee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad on October 2, 1969, Mr. James M. Wilson, Jr., Deputy Chief of Mission of the United States Embassy in Manila testified under oath that "President Marcos accepted (from the United States) as directly related to PHILCAG . . . the equipment for PHILCAG and the special overseas allowance for PHILCAG over and above their regular pay." (page 255) In support of Mr. Wilson's statement, the Department of Defense provided the Subcommittee a table detailing "additional allowances paid by the United States to PHILCAG" (page 265) and a listing of financial and material support of PHILCAG given by the United States which totalled "in the neighborhood of $36 million." (p. 278).

In his prepared statement filed with the Subcommittee and printed in the Subcommittee record, Mr. Wilson detailed assistance to the Philippines in connection with PHILCAG totalling $38,809,661 (p. 358).

On November 20, 1969, the press carried the enclosed story which contains the following paragraph:

" 'The Philippines has received no fee or payment of any kind for the Philcag or its personnel nor has there been any grant in consideration for the sending of Philcag to Viet Nam,' a Presidential spokesman said in an official statement."

In light of the testimony given the Subcommittee and the above mentioned statement, reportedly made by a spokesman for the Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos, we request that your organization make a detailed study of the payments discussed by Mr. Wilson and determine the factors relevant to their disposition by U.S. Government officials.

Sincerely,

STUART SYMINGTON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad.

EXHIBIT 2

COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D.C., March 21, 1970.

Hon. STUART SYMINGTON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on U.S. Security Agreements and Commitments Abroad, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have completed our review which was undertaken pursuant to your letter request of November 26, 1969, to make a study of the payments made to the Government of the Republic of the Philippines by the Government of the United States in support of the Philippine Civic Action Group (PHILCAG) in Vietnam. After the receipt of your letter we met with the staff of your Subcommittee and it was agreed that we would direct our study to (1) payments for the cost of per diem and overseas allowances of PHILCAG personnel in Vietnam, (2) material and logistical support provided to PHILCAG by the United States Military Assistance Command in Vietnam, and (3) related material assistance given to military units in the Philippines.

We are now in the process of completing our final report which will be issued to you after it has been reviewed for security classification by the Departments of State and Defense. The information in this letter has been obtained from unclassified sources.

In summary, our report will show that we have verified the information contained in our interim report of February 19, 1970, and that the quid pro quo assistance given to the Philippine Government, which was service funded, was substantially as described by Mr. James M. Wilson, Jr., Deputy Chief of Mission, U.S. Embassy, Manila, in his testimony before your Subcommittee. This assistance consisted of approximately $35 million of equipment and logistical support and about $3.6 of direct payments to the Government of the Philippines. Due to incomplete Department of Defense documentation, we were able to verify only about $31 million of this amount; however from the evidence we feel that the actual cost was probably closer to the amount stated by Mr. Wilson. We also found evidence that other forms of United States assistance to the Philippine Government, such as military and economic aid funded under the Foreign Assistance Act, were increased during the period of the PHILCAG commitment to Vietnam.

The $3.6 million of funds included in the assistance was appropriated by the United States Congress for the Department of Defense and paid to the Philippine Government in quarterly payments between October 1966 and October 1969. One additional payment was made in January 1970. These quarterly payments were made by United States Treasury dollar checks payable to the Secretary of National Defense of the Philippines. Most of the checks were endorsed with a signature which appears to be that of Ernesto S. Mata, who is the Secretary of National Defense. The canceled checks show that they were deposited in the Philippine Veteran's Bank, usually the Camp Aguinaldo Branch. Attached is a photostatic copy of the front and back of one of the canceled checks [not shown in RECORD].

We were unable to ascertain whether the Philcag troops received the per diem and overseas allowances as shown in the following schedule of daily rates which was used to compute the amount of the quarterly payment by the United States:

Brigadier general	$7.00
Colonel	6.50
Lieutenant colonel	6.00
Major	5.50
Captain	5.00
First lieutenant	4.50
Second lieutenant	4.00
Master sergeant/first sergeant	2.50
Technical sergeant/staff sergeant	2.00
Sergeant	1.50
Corporal	1.20
Private first class/private	1.10

Our inquiries into this matter were confined to United States sources and disclosed that no information was required of or received from the Philippine Government on the disposition of the funds paid to them by the United States.

We regret that we were not able to give you a report on our study in a more timely manner; however, the delay could not have been avoided by us because of the time-consuming screening process exercised by the Departments of State and Defense before making records available for our examination. Our work was seriously hampered and delayed by the reluctance of the Departments to give us access to the documents, papers, and records which we considered pertinent to our review. Generally, we were given access to only those documents, papers, and records which we were able to specifically identify and request, and then only after time-consuming screening at various levels within the Departments. While we have been able to obtain sufficient information upon which to base our final report to you, we are not certain that we have the full story. In view of the restricted access to records there is the possibility that the agencies may have withheld information which is pertainent to our study.

As part of our continuing reviews of the foreign assistance programs we plan to make a more detailed review of the United States assistance to the Philippine Government, and we will report to the Congress on the results of this review in our usual manner.

Sincerely yours,

ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States.

SENATE RESOLUTION 376—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION RELATING TO CANCER RESEARCH

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, for myself and Senators ALLEN, BAYH, BIBLE, BROOKE, BURDICK, BYRD of West Virginia, CANNON, CASE, CHURCH, CRANSTON, EAGLETON, ERVIN, FONG, FULBRIGHT, GOLDWATER, GOODELL, HARRIS, HART, HARTKE, HOLLINGS, HUGHES, INOUYE, JACKSON, JAVITS, KENNEDY, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MCGOVERN, MCINTYRE, METCALF, MONDALE, MOSS, MURPHY, MUSKIE, NELSON, PACKWOOD, PASTORE, PELL, PROUTY, PROXMIRE, RANDOLPH, SCHWEIKER, SMITH of Maine, SPARKMAN, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and YOUNG of Ohio, I submit a Senate resolution and ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

Mr. YARBOROUGH. This resolution has the massive support of Members of this body, including the present occupant of the chair (Mr. ALLEN), the majority leader, the Senator from West Virginia—and I want to refer in a minute to the former Senator from West Virginia, Senator Neely, who suffered from cancer—we feel the resolution will be adopted. Preparation of many months has gone into the resolution.

THE NEED FOR AN INVESTIGATION OF THE CAUSES AND CURES OF CANCER

Mr. President, a medical dictionary defines cancer, which comes from the Latin word meaning crab, as "a progressive growth of tissue not adequately controlled by restraining forces within an individual's body, proceeding without regard to the needs of the body, leading ultimately, if unchecked, to the destruction of the individual in which it arose."

I prefer a more vivid definition of cancer given on the floor of the U.S. Senate more than 40 years ago by the late Senator Matt Neely, of West Virginia, who died in 1958 of the very disease he had been fighting legislatively for more than three decades.

Referring to the description by Charles Dickens in "A Tale of Two Cities" of the horrors of the guillotine in revolutionary France, Matt Neely on May 18, 1928, stood in the well of the Senate and uttered these prophetic words:

I propose to speak of a monster that is more insatiate than the guillotine; more irresistible than the mightiest army that ever marched to battle; more terrifying than any other scourge that has ever threatened the existence of the human race. The name of this loathsome, deadly and insatiate monster is cancer. It is older than the human race. Evidence of cancer has been found in the fossil remains of a serpent that is supposed to have lived millions of years ago. Records made on papyri by the ancient Egyptians show that the cancer curse was known in the valley of the Nile more than 2,000 years before the birth of Christ.

At that time, Senator Neely noted that cancer took 125,000 lives annually. He warned the Senate that the annual toll from cancer would rise appreciably unless a major medical research offensive was mounted against it. Today, as we note the 320,000 lives lost to cancer each year, we realize the wisdom of Senator Neely's words.

I well recall the day I was sworn into this body, on the 29th day of April 1957, Matt Neely was brought to the Chamber in a wheel chair. He wanted to be here for that occasion. He was a friend of mine.

The rise in the incidence of cancer in the United States has reached epidemic proportions, according to a 1968 report from the National Advisory Cancer Council.

Last year, cancer killed more than 300,000 Americans. This vicious disease, which has cursed the family of man since the beginning of recorded history, strikes down one man, woman, or child every 2 minutes.

In 1968, cancer was the cause of 16 percent of all deaths in the United States; by way of comparison, in 1900 cancer was responsible for less than 4 percent of all deaths in this country. Of course, much of this increased mortality is due to the lengthened lifespan of the average American—many more of our people now survive the dread infectious killers of an earlier age, only to succumb to cancer in later years. But it is important to note that cancer is not just a disease of old age. About 45 percent of all of our people who die from cancer are under 65 years of age, with 10 percent of these under the age of 45.

According to a recent scientific report from the National Cancer Institute, unless we find new cures for the major forms of cancer the incidence of this disease in our population will more than double by 1985. The alarming nature of this projected rise can only be fully appreciated when one realizes that over 50,000,000 of our present population will get cancer, and 33,000,000 will die of it unless new cures are found.

As a nation, we are rightfully disturbed by our manpower losses in times of war. However, these losses are only a fraction of the toll exacted each year by mankind's most relentless foe—cancer. For example, in one year cancer kills more Americans than all of our military deaths during the 4 years of World War II. Last year, cancer killed more than 30 times the number of boys who lost their lives in combat in Vietnam.

As for our veterans, more than 5 million will be either hospitalized, or entitled to hospitalization, for cancer in the course of their civilian lives. If 80 percent of these veterans receive full hospital care from the Veterans' Administration, the cost to the taxpayer will approximate $3.4 billion.

The cost of cancer to our economy and its people is staggering. Four years ago, a Presidential commission came up with a minimum loss estimate of $8 billion. Losses in productivity and earning capacity are astounding—in the age group 25 to 64 alone, 100,000 man-years of productivity is multiplied by the working lifespan of the average American, the $8 billion estimated loss is seen as conservative.

As a people, we have not been totally indifferent to the menace of cancer but, by the same token, we have not made the conquest of it a national goal.

In 1937, the Congress established the National Cancer Institute, but during the first two decades of its existence it did not give it the funds necessary to mount a research program commensurate with the size of the problem. In the late 1950's and early 1960's, the Congress did vote considerably accelerated funds to the National Cancer Institute; however, during the past 3 years the NCI budget has been barely sufficient to maintain the status quo in the face of rising research costs. In very simple terms, this kind of holding operation in the face of rising research costs and increased demands for the training of new investigators results in an actual cut of 10 to 15 percent in ongoing programs.

The Federal Government is spending less than $200 million a year on finding cures for cancer. This expenditure averages out to about $4 per year for each potential cancer victim. It is less than the sum spent each year by the Research Service of the Department of Agriculture. It is equal to the sum we Americans spend each year for ballpoint pens, and far less than the $358 million we spend each year for chewing gum.

However, even with the comparatively small sums we have spent over the past 30 years against cancer, some remarkable successes have been achieved. Thirty years ago, the chief cause of cancer death in women was cancer of the uterus. In subsequent years, due to improved diagnosis—the Pap smear—and early surgical intervention, the death rate from this once major form of cancer has dropped by more than 50 percent. In addition, due to the more recent developments in drug therapy, there have been smaller but perceptible drops in the death rates from leukemia—a devastating illness among young children—and from Hodgkin's disease.

Overall, where early treatment is instituted, the ratio of cancer patients being saved is about 1 in every 3, as against a ratio of only 1 in every 5 at the time the National Cancer Institute was established in 1937. It is important to recognize that this represents a gain in lives of about 50,000 men and women each year.

However, our successes to date have been too sporadic, and have been limited to only a few kinds of cancer. We have made little progress against the slow-growing tumors which now claim an increasing number of American lives. For example, one-half of cancer deaths last year were due to malignancies too difficult to diagnose and almost impossible to cure—cancers of the lung, stomach, prostate, colon, and rectum.

In November of last year, National Cancer Institute scientists predicted that they could achieve chemical control of these slow-growing tumors in as little as 5 years if they were given sharply increased financial support. Under this year's budget and the one recommended for the coming year, no progress is possible toward that goal.

Furthermore, there is far from sufficient money available to exploit the tremendous scientific push toward a discovery of the relationship between viruses and various forms of human cancer. Over the past several years, distinguished cancer researchers in many parts of the country have published their findings suggesting a causal relationship between viruses and cancer. The establishment of such a relationship could lead to the development of one or more vaccines against major forms of cancer. As an example of the new hope in this area, I quote from a long article on the subject which appeared in this January's issue of the medical publication, Family Health:

Scientists may be on the verge of attaining one of the most sought-after goals in medicine—control of cancer.

It could take the form of vaccines to prevent specific malignant diseases, such as leukemia and cervical cancer. The first steps toward an experimental vaccine are being taken, and human testing on a small scale could start as early as 1973, if everything goes perfectly.

Or cancer control could come from a single injection designed to prevent all forms of the disease. This approach is considerably more controversial than the specific vaccines, but in the opinion of some cancer researchers, it is the real solution to the problem.

The key to both possibilities is the link between viruses and human cancer . . .

As a nation, we cannot afford business-as-usual budgets in the battle to conquer cancer.

Ten years ago, under the chairmanship of Senator Lister Hill, I heard leading cancer research experts of the Nation testify before the Senate Health Subcommittee, that with appropriations of $1 billion a year for 10 years, we could find the cause of and cure for cancer. The appropriations have not been made, although that total cost would be only one-tenth of the hundred billion dollars we have spent in Southeast Asia in that 10-year period. It is time, past time, for scientifically educated America to find the cause and cure of cancer.

Under the authority of the resolution which I am today introducing, I plan the establishment of a Committee of Consultants on the Conquest of Cancer to make a study and report their findings and recommendations to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I can assure the Senate that this Committee will be composed of some of the Nation's most distinguished scientists and lay leaders who have dedicated their lives to the eventual conquest of cancer. Over the past few months, I have been discussing this mission with some of these outstanding Americans, and their response has been overwhelmingly and enthusiastically favorable.

As I see it and as they see it, the Committee of Consultants would have two primary tasks: First, to examine the adequacy and effectiveness of the present level of both governmental and nongovernmental support of cancer research, and second, to recommend to Congress and to the American people what must be done to achieve cures for the major forms of cancer by 1976—the 200th anniversary of the founding of this great Republic. It should be free to make recommendations in the fields of research, training, financing, and administration, with particular attention directed toward the creation of a new administrative agency which would guarantee that the conquest of cancer becomes a highly visible national goal.

There is a strong precedent for this kind of advisory committee in the work of my predecessor as chairman of this committee, Senator Lister Hill. In 1959 he proposed, and the full Committee on Appropriations unanimously agreed, that is should establish a Committee of Consultants on Medical Research "to determine whether the funds provided by the Government for research in dread diseases are sufficient and efficiently spent in the best interests of the research for which they are designated."

The chairman of the Committee of Consultants was Mr. Boisfeuillet Jones, a distinguished lawyer who was then vice president for health services at Emory University. Its 12 members included a number of distinguished scientists, but it also included several industrialists of the caliber of Gen. David Sarnoff, the chairman of the board of the Radio Corp. of America. Its report, made to the Senate Appropriations Committee in formal hearings in May of 1960, has had an enormous positive impact on the structure and progress of the general research effort conducted by the National Institutes of Health.

It is my deep-seated conviction that the time is long overdue for the setting up of a comparable nongovernmental committee in the complex field of cancer. I think all of us in the Senate need, and would benefit tremendously from, the considered judgments of such a group. Individually, we do not have the time to look into these intricate issues, but this is no excuse for postponing action.

Every 2 minutes, the clock ticks and every 2 minutes an American dies of cancer. We are a great and powerful nation and we have it within our power to end this slaughter.

Let us get on with the job.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The resolution (S. Res. 376), which reads as follows, was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

S. RES. 376

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized under sections 134(a) and 136 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, and in accordance with its jurisdiction specified by rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate, to examine, investigate, and make a complete study of any and all matters pertaining to (1) the present status and extent of scientific research conducted by governmental and nongovernmental agencies to ascertain the causes and develop means for the treatment, cure, and elimination of cancer, (2) the prospect for success in such endeavors, and (3) means and measures necessary or desirable to facilitate success in such endeavors at the earliest possible time.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, from February 1, 1970, to January 31, 1971, inclusive, is authorized (1) to make such expenditures as it deems advisable; (2) to employ, upon a temporary basis, technical, clerical, and other assistants and consultants: Provided, That the minority is authorized to select one person for appointment, and the person so selected shall be appointed and his compensation shall be so fixed that his gross rate shall not be less by more than $2,700 than the highest gross rate paid to any other employee; (3) with the prior consent of the heads of the departments or agencies concerned, and the Committee on Rules and Administration, to utilize the reimbursable services, information, facilities, and personnel of any of the departments or agencies of the Government; and (4) establish and defray the expenses of such advisory committees as it deems advisable.

SEC. 3. The committee shall report its findings, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it deems advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, but not later than January 31, 1971.

SEC. 4. Expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $250,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I have joined as a cosponsor of the resolution introduced today by Senator YARBOROUGH, authorizing the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to study research activities conducted to ascertain the causes and develop cures to eliminate cancer.

I have been a longtime supporter of appropriations for cancer research and I believe that we must do all we can to combat this viscious killer.

Cancer continues to be the second major cause of death in this country and it is estimated that there will be 625,000 new cases during 1970.

Tremendous progress has been made in the treatment of cancer as a result of research conducted and supported by the National Cancer Institute. One such program has been the cancer chemotherapy program. Treatment with chemotherapeutic agents has lengthened the survival of acute leukemic patients. The number of acute leukemic patients who have been free of evidence of disease for 5 or more years has now risen to well over 200 identified cases. No such cases were known only two decades ago.

The importance of this research is underlined by a letter which I received recently from Patrick Baumgardner, a 19-year-old from Tacoma, Wash. Patrick is a courageous young man who is suffering from leukemia. I ask unanimous consent that his letter be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARCH 5, 1970.

DEAR SENATOR JACKSON: I am 19 years old and have recently contacted the cancer of the blood known as Leukemia. God has been good to me, and I am now in a remission stage. I pray every day a cure will be found for my disease and all forms of cancer.

Oh, please do all you can do to influence your fellow congressmen to PUSH the cancer program and it's appropriations in Congress. You just can't understand the agony of cancer until you come in contact with this killer personally. Mr. Jackson, I love life—help me hold on to it as long as I can. Please! Who knows—you may be next. Remember, "One in every four of us will develop cancer!"

Sincerely yours,

PATRICK BAUMGARDNER.

Mr. JACKSON. Although the Senate voted to increase the appropriations for the National Cancer Institute, the institute is funded at less than $200 million for fiscal 1970. The resolution which has been introduced today will establish a Committee of Consultants to examine the adequacy and effectiveness of this support of cancer research and make recommendations as to what must be done in the future.

I believe that we must conquer cancer and we must do it now. It is my hope that we can, through an increasing research effort, provide the answers to the many questions that still exist about cancer and its cures. And I hope that we can do this soon, to help those like Patrick Baumgardner who have already been stricken.

NOMINATION OF JUDGE CARSWELL TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I intend to vote against the nomination of Judge Carswell to the Supreme Court. There is much at stake in the Senate's decision on this matter and I wish the record to be clear as to my position.

Mr. President, let me comment first about the standards that apply when the Senate considers nominations to the Supreme Court. Last year, when the Senate was debating a controversial Cabinet nomination, I argued that the President was entitled to wide latitude in the selection of his Cabinet. I took the position that the President, not the Senate, sets the standards of competence and qualification for his Cabinet. These are the President's men and, barring some extraordinary deficiency, he is entitled to exercise the Executive responsibility with men of his own choosing. If the voters are unhappy with his selection, their voice will be heard at the next election.

This deference to Presidential choice is not, however, the standard to be applied when the Senate is asked to advise and consent to Supreme Court nominations for life tenure. These are not men who serve at the President's pleasure or execute his programs. They are members of a powerful tribunal, wielding influence far beyond the reach of any President. Their power stems from the Constitution, not from the Office of the Chief Executive.

Mr. President, it is not enough in this day and age that a nominee to the Supreme Court simply meet certain minimum standards. This is the only Supreme Court we have. If there was ever any doubt, the past two decades have shown what a dramatic and decisive role it plays in our life. Case after case presents the Court with critical issues. Decision after decision has far-reaching implications and enormous impact on every facet of our society.

The intellectual demands on the nine Justices of the Supreme Court are staggering. No army of law clerks, no array of legal treatises will substitute if a man is not equipped to meet this challenge. The standards to be applied to prospective members of this Court must be set with these facts in mind. They must be set high, and the burden is on the proponents of a nomination to show that the nominee in question is eminently qualified to serve on the highest court of the land.

This burden has not been met in the case of Judge Carswell's nomination. My colleagues on the Judiciary Committee have amply demonstrated his lack of qualification, and I need not belabor the points they have already made. The fact is that Judge Carswell's record nowhere reflects the professional competence, the openmindedness, the ability to make the difficult decisions, that we have a right to expect from a nominee to the Supreme Court. I think it is quite clear that he has been unable to separate his personal views on the matter of race from his obligation to uphold the Constitution and law of the land embodied in the decisions of its highest courts.

Tempting as it must have been to argue, no Senator—even among Judge Carswell's ardent supporters—has placed on record the view that he is brilliant or exceptional. The expressed hope of some Senators that he will rise to the occasion on his appointment to the Supreme Court leaves little doubt about the level he presently occupies.

We are told that the President wants to nominate a southerner and a so-called strict constructionist to the Supreme Court. Whether or not this description fits Judge Carswell is open to question. But there are others, both southern and conservative in their approach to the judicial function, whose qualifications to serve on this Court are beyond doubt. The issue is not philosophy—the issue is competence. And in stressing competence, I include in that term the ability to decide cases irrespective of personal preference.

Mr. President, I have voted for the Supreme Court nominees of the last four Presidents, starting with Chief Justice Warren in 1953 and continuing up to Chief Justice Burger in 1969. These men have come before the Senate with distinguished records at the bar, on the bench, or in high public office. They have been liberals and conservatives, activists, and strict constructionists. They were presented to the Senate as men of proven ability and intellectual capacity who, regardless of their personal philosophies, would contribute to the effective functioning of the Supreme Court. This last point is not without significance. We have an obligation to nominate those who are equal to the challenge of the work and equipped to share the burdens with their colleagues.

People all over America look to the Supreme Court as the protector of our civil and constitutional rights and liberties. Many of our citizens are strengthened in their resolve to seek peacefully the civil rights and liberties guaranteed to all Americans by the determination of the Supreme Court to hear their case, and to respond with decisions reflecting the justice and humanity of the Constitution. The Court has demonstrated that justice can be obtained by law rather than lawlessness; by judicial decision rather than destruction; by reason rather than revolution; by tribunals and not by terror.

The Supreme Court is the central instrument for the protection of the few—be it one man or many millions. I cannot vote to confirm as Justice a man who does not inspire my full confidence that he is a detached, unprejudiced, and judicious judge.

Mr. President, I have reviewed with care the hearings, the reports, and the comments of many Senators and others qualified to have a view on this matter. It is clear to me that the case for Judge Carswell is weak. His qualifications for the Court are meager and the nomination should not be confirmed.

PETITIONS

Petitions were laid before the Senate and referred as indicated:

By the ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. METCALF):

A resolution adopted by the city council of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for action relative to ending the war in Vietnam; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A resolution adopted by the Laguna Hills Republican Club, of Laguna Hills, Calif., extending its condolences on the death of Hon. James B. Utt, late a Representative from the State of California; ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment:

S. 3313. A bill to exempt Federal Housing Administration and Veterans' Administration mortgages and loans from the interest and usury laws of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 91-750).

AMENDMENT OF COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934 RELATING TO EQUAL-TIME REQUIREMENTS FOR CANDIDATES FOR PUBLIC OFFICE—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 91-751)

Mr. PASTORE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported an original bill (S. 3637) to amend section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to equal-time requirements for candidates for public office, and for other purposes, and submitted a report thereon, which bill was placed on the calendar and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PACKWOOD:

S. 3632. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to limit the number of personal exemptions allowable for children of a taxpayer who are born after 1972; to the Committee on Finance.

(The remarks of Mr. PACKWOOD when he introduced the bill appear earlier in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. PROUTY:

S. 3633. A bill for the relief of Yosef Pincu; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PELL:

S. 3634. A bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to provide for the conduct of a systems analysis of alternative national health care plans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(The remarks of Mr. PELL when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. PASTORE (by request):

S. 3635. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to provide for the regulation of community antenna television systems; to the Committee on Commerce.

(The remarks of Mr. PASTORE when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. DOMINICK):

S. 3636. A bill to extend and amend the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(The remarks of Mr. JAVITS when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. PASTORE:

S. 3637. A bill to amend section 315 of the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to equal-time requirements for candidates for public office, and for other purposes; placed on the calendar.

By Mr. FONG:

S. 3638. A bill for the relief of Elpidio D. Ybarzabal, Jr.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. BENNETT):

S. 3639. A bill to increase the supply of decent housing and to consolidate, extend and improve laws relating to housing and urban renewal and development; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(The remarks of Mr. SPARKMAN when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.

By Mr. SPARKMAN (for himself and Mr. MUSKIE):

S. 3640. A bill to provide for the development of a national urban growth policy, and to encourage and support the rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, counties, and towns, with emphasis upon the development of new communities and upon inner city development; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

(The remarks of Mr. SPARKMAN when he introduced the bill appear later in the RECORD.)

By Mr. TOWER:

S. 3641. A bill for the relief of Edgar Fredrico Estrada; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PROUTY (for himself, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. COTTON, and Mr. PEARSON):

S.J. Res. 186. A joint resolution providing for a full and complete study of charges for the transportation of freight by all regulated modes of transportation and the submission of recommendations with respect to appropriate standards for determining the lawfullness of such charges and the most effective means of administering such standards; to the Committee on Commerce.

(The remarks of Mr. PROUTY when he introduced the joint resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

By Mr. HRUSKA:

S.J. Res. 187. A joint resolution to authorize the President to designate the third Sunday in June of each year as Father's Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(The remarks of Mr. HRUSKA when he introduced the joint resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

S. 3635—INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO PROVIDE FOR THE REGULATION OF COMMUNITY ANTENNA TELEVISION SYSTEM

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, for some time the Senate Commerce Committee, more particularly the Subcommittee on Communications, has concerned itself with the complex subject of community antenna television and its relationship to free broadcasting.

On December 19, 1969, Senator MCCLELLAN forwarded to this committee a letter indicating that the Subcommittee on Patents, Trademarks, and Copyrights reported to the full committee on the judiciary S. 543, a bill generally revising the copyright law. Section 111 of S. 543 is concerned with secondary transmission by cable systems.

Senator MCCLELLAN raised the question that section 111 could have an impact on the regulatory aspects of the FCC's responsibility is the field and that the Senate Commerce Committee would, therefore, have an interest. As a consequence, the Senate Commerce Committee requested the Federal Communications Commission to review this matter to determine the impact the bill would have on the FCC's broadcast-cable television regulatory policies.

On March 11 the Chairman of the FCC, Mr. Dean Burch, replied and indicated that the Commission believed that clarifying legislation in the form of general guidelines should be adopted.

I ask at this point that the letter in full from Mr. Burch be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., March 11, 1970.

Hon. JOHN O. PASTORE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Communications, Senate Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: You have requested the Commission's views on those portions of S. 543 which deal with CATV. The Commission appreciates the opportunity since S. 543 would have such substantial impact on our broadcast-cable television regulatory policies.

The Commission has long favored Congressional guidance in this important field, including the enactment of a bill which would be a meld of copyright and communications law. See Letter of Chairman Hyde to Chairman McClellan, dated February 17, 1969. But the approach of S. 543 to the CATV field raises substantial questions.

We do not refer merely to the need for clarifying the language of the bill, nor even to the more significant questions raised by its treatment of several important communications policy questions. Rather, we wish to raise the fundamental question whether it is a sound legislative approach to attempt to deal in such detail with a dynamic, changing field such as is here involved.

For example, the concept of "adequate television service" in S. 543, defined as precisely as it is, or the use of fixed mileage concepts like the 35-mile zone for program exclusivity, or the inflexible FCC non-duplication requirement specified, may not be legislatively sound, even recognizing that in some respects there is some authority given the agency to make future revisions. The approach which has been taken in the Communications Act seems preferable to us—namely, the Congressional determination of general guidelines, with the Commission left to develop and, most important, revise detailed policies to implement those guidelines in the light of rapidly changing communications technologies, and with Congress overseeing such Commission activities, particularly through the legislative hearing process.

We wish to point out that the Commission has made several false starts in the CATV field (e.g., compare Report on CATV and TV Repeater Services 26 FCC 403 (1959), with First Report and Order in Docket 14895, 38 FCC 683 (1965)), and has often had to revise its policies in light of the changing nature of the field. We do not cite this flexibility as a weakness, but rather as a strength of the administrative process. See National Broadcasting Co. v. U.S., 319 U.S. 190, 219 (1943), where the Court stated:

While Congress did not give the Commission unfettered discretion to regulate all phases of the radio industry, it did not frustrate the purposes for which the Communications Act of 1934 was brought into being by attempting an itemized catalogue of the specific manifestations of the general problems for the solution of which it was establishing a regulatory agency. That would have stereotyped the powers of the Commission to specific details in regulating a field of enterprise the dominant characteristic of which was the rapid pace of its unfolding. And so Congress did what experience had taught it in similar attempts at regulation, even in fields where the subject-matter of regulation was far less fluid and dynamic than radio. The essence of that experience was to define broad areas for regulation and to establish standards for judgment adequately related in their application to the problems to be solved.

We therefore believe that clarifying legislation in this field should set forth general guidelines and eschew detail. This approach, we believe, may also be employed as to any copyright legislation dealing with CATV. Such legislation can be broadly framed—for example, the Congress could adopt a provision that a CATV system shall have a compulsory license for such signals as the Commission, by rule or order, may authorize the system to carry. The copyright law could then specify the appropriate amount to be paid, or method of determining the amount, a method for distributing the funds thus paid in (e.g., a so-called "ASCAP-BMI" method), a provision for periodic adjustments in the amounts to be paid, and any exemption for existing small systems deemed desirable.

This would leave the remaining communications policy matters for resolution by the Commission in appropriate rule making and other proceedings, or by the Congress through general CATV legislation and subsequent agency regulation. As stated, we would welcome such Congressional guidance in this important field. Thus, Congress could set forth general guidelines aimed at the orderly accommodation of both cable and broadcasting in order to secure maximum diversity of programming, through the maintenance and expansion of free broadcasting and the provision via cable of multiple reception, origination and related services. The guidelines could also include such matters as fair competition for programming sources, minimum disruption of existing cable systems, and appropriate application to cable systems of Public Law 87–331, dealing with the telecasting of professional football, baseball, basketball or hockey contests. In short, the clear advantage of proceeding in this fashion (i.e., agency action under present or revised Congressional guidelines, with appropriate Congressional oversight of specific Commission actions) would be the retention of flexibility to adjust policies to changing circumstances.

The Commission hopes that the foregoing is helpful to you in your consideration of this most important matter. The Commission would, of course, be glad to cooperate with your Committee and its staff in any way which you might find useful.

This letter was adopted by the Commission at its meeting of March 11, 1970.

By direction of the Commission:

DEAN BURCH,
Chairman.

P.S.—Commissioner Bartley believes there is more merit to S. 543, with the flexibility afforded the Commission in regard to CATV than what he believes to be the likelihood of failure of adoption of copyright revision legislation at an early date.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, following receipt of this letter, I requested the FCC to submit the legislative guidelines. By letter dated March 24, 1970, the Commission sent me a letter outlining its views and also enclosing a copy of a bill which I am introducing today.

I also ask that the March 24, 1970, letter from the Commission be printed in full at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., Mar. 24, 1970.

Hon. JOHN O. PASTORE,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Communications, Senate Commerce Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In line with your request, the Commission is submitting a draft of suggested legislative amendments to the Communications Act, which are of a clarifying nature and give general guidance to the Commission in the CATV field.

The attached draft reflects the general guidelines set out at pp. 2–3 of my letter of March 11, 1970. Under these guidelines Congress would be directing the Commission to effect the orderly accommodation of both cable and broadcasting in order to secure maximum diversity of programming through the maintenance and expansion of free broadcasting and the provision via cable of multiple reception, origination and related services.

We recognize that there would be great interest in the Commission's possible actions to implement the above guidelines, and would, of course, be prepared to give some indication of those actions. You will appreciate, however, that the Commission is still in the process of analyzing the voluminous material received in its pending rule making proceedings in this complex area.

Finally, as stated, it is our hope that enactment of legislative guidelines in the Communications Act, along the above lines, would also facilitate legislative resolution of the difficult question of copyright. Specifically, we raise the possibility that a provision might then be inserted into S. 543 which simply bestowed upon CATV systems a compulsory license for such signals as the Commission, by rule or order, might authorize the system to carry. Other specifications of such a provision would, of course, go to such matters as the appropriate amounts to be paid and the mechanism of compulsory license (and any exemption for existing small systems).

The Commission hopes that the foregoing is helpful to you, and again stresses its desire to cooperate fully with your Committee in its consideration of this most important matter.

By direction of the Commission:

DEAN BURCH,
Chairman.

Mr. PASTORE. Mr. President, it is my understanding that copies of the two letters have been made available to Senator MCCLELLAN.

It is my hope that the committee will hold hearings on this proposal in the very near future.

I ask that the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of Virginia). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3635) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to provide for the regulation of community antenna television systems, introduced by Mr. PASTORE, by request, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3635

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 3 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 153) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(gg) 'Community antenna system' means any facility which, in whole or in part, receives directly or indirectly over the air and amplifies or otherwise modifies the signals transmitting programs broadcast by one or more broadcast stations and distributes such signals by wire or cable to subscribing members of the public who pay for such service."

(b) Part I of title III of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 301 et seq.) is amended by inserting therein, immediately after section 330 thereof, the following new section:

"REGULATION OF COMMUNITY ANTENNA SYSTEMS

"SEC. 331. (a) The Commission shall, as the public interest, convenience, or necessity requires, have authority—

"(1) to issue authorizations and orders, make rules and regulations, and prescribe such conditions or restrictions with respect to the construction, technical characteristics, and operation of community antenna systems, to the extent necessary or appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act, with due regard to the orderly accommodation of both the community antenna and broadcasting industries, in order to secure maximum diversity of programing through the maintenance and expansion of broadcasting and the provision via community antenna systems of multiple reception, origination and related services; and

"(2) to make general rules exempting from regulation, in whole or in part, certain community antenna systems where it is determined that such regulation is unnecessary because of the size or nature of the systems so exempted.

The Commission shall, in determining the application of any rule or regulation concerning the carriage of broadcast stations by community antenna systems, give due regard to the avoidance of substantial disruption of the services to subscribers of community antenna systems which were validly in operation on April 1, 1970.

"(b) The Commission shall prescribe such rules and regulations and issue such orders as may be necessary to require the deletion by community antenna systems of signals carrying any professional football, baseball, basketball, or hockey contest if, after application by the appropriate league, the Commission finds that the failure to delete such signals would be contrary to the purposes for which the antitrust laws are made inapplicable to certain agreements under the Act of September 30, 1961 (75 Stat. 732; 15 U.S.C. 1291 et seq.).".

S. 3639—INTRODUCTION OF THE HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am introducing for myself and the Senator from Utah (Mr. BENNETT) for appropriate reference a bill, Highlights of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1970.

This is the administration's bill sent to Congress by Secretary George Romney of the Department of Housing and Urban Development.

The essential thrust of the bill is a proposed overhaul of the existing FHA housing laws in which Secretary Romney says he is proposing to consolidate 50 programs into eight. The bill also proposes significant changes in the public housing, urban renewal, and other housing and urban development programs. Secretary Romney says that the major goals of the proposed legislation are:

First, to more efficiently provide dwelling units for low-, moderate-, and middle-income families by streamlining and consolidating existing HUD programs.

Second, to attract substantially greater private sector investment in low-cost housing by eliminating unnecessary bureaucratic requirements and establishing uniform criteria for subsidized housing programs.

Third, to make the assistance programs more responsive to the needs of local communities by basing eligibility limits and construction requirements on income and cost factors prevalent in the community.

Fourth, to include the optimum number of low-income families in rental and homeownership programs by deepening the maximum subsidy available for a certain percentage of units.

I have not fully studied the provisions of this legislation and therefore am in no position to recommend or reject any of these proposals at this time. There are several provisions which I recognize as extremely controversial and which will require extensive hearings and debate before agreeing. Also several of the provisions proposed are contrary to positions taken by our Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Affairs. I am not yet sure that I can support these particular provisions.

I have promised Secretary Romney to give the bill full and extensive hearings and committee action as soon as possible. However, the Banking and Currency Committee's calendar is very heavy and we may not be able to schedule hearings in the immediate future.

Last week the Banking and Currency Committee approved mortgage credit legislation which is to be reported to the Senate, and hopefully taken up very shortly after the Easter recess. The recommended bill, called the "Emergency Home Finance Act of 1970," is intended to provide additional mortgage credit to stimulate the sagging housing market.

The bill I am introducing today should not be confused with the emergency mortgage credit bill. They are quite different. The mortgage credit proposal needs prompt action to meet the urgent needs of the spring home building season but this more comprehensive housing bill will probably take several months of deliberation before enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 3639) to increase the supply of decent housing and to consolidate, extend, and improve laws relating to housing and urban renewal and development, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN, for himself and Mr. BENNETT, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

S. 3640—INTRODUCTION OF THE URBAN GROWTH AND NEW COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I am introducing for myself and the junior Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) for appropriate reference a bill entitled "The Urban Growth and New Community Development Act of 1970."

The purpose of this bill is to provide for the development of a national urban growth policy to support the rational and orderly growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, and small towns, with emphasis on the development of new communities and inner-city development.

This bill is an outgrowth of work done over the last several years, particularly by the National Committee on Urban Growth Policy, of which I was a member, on the subject of America's future urban growth. That committee published a report in 1969 which suggested that the Federal Government should help support the development of 100 cities of approximately 100,000 population and 10 larger cities in the next 30 years.

Most importantly, however, the committee laid great stress on the need to develop a national urban growth policy, and the financial and technical resources to implement such a plan, Mr. President, I do not need to tell this body the necessity for the leadership of our Nation, at the Federal, State, and local levels, to look ahead and intelligently plan the growth of our cities and communities in the years ahead. As we look at the overcrowded cities and the continuing flight from country to the cities, it is obvious that action needs to be taken to get control of this movement.

This bill would provide for the development of a national policy under which the Nation's resources and the power of Government, representing the best interest of our people, would be mobilized to guide the growth of our communities in which people will live in the next 30 years.

There is much talk today about the quality of our environment. Sometimes I fear that the environmentalists forget our cities and the plight of people living in slums and overcrowded blighted areas. The purpose of this bill would be to develop an urban growth policy in which environmental factors would be given full consideration in conjunction with the elimination of slums in our overcrowded cities. I believe the figures show that our 200 million inhabitants occupy only 1 percent of the land area of the United States. We need to plan a latter distribution of our people and with proper incentive and planned urban growth I know that we can do it.

I hope that our Banking and Currency Committee will hold hearings on this bill in the near future and that the Congress will move rapidly toward developing plans for our future growth in the years ahead.

As everyone knows, the planning of the growth of America is an extremely difficult subject, and I want it understood that the bill before us makes certain proposals to carry out such a plan. However, obviously, these proposals need considerable study, and before we can agree on the best policy before us, there are several provisions, for example, in this bill that I need further information on before I can fully support it. However, I believe that this should not prevent us from pushing forward with the bill as written.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a summary of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the summary will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3640) to provide for the development of a national urban growth policy, and to encourage and support the rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, counties, and towns, with emphasis upon the development of new communities and upon inner city development, introduced by Mr. SPARKMAN, for himself and Mr. MUSKIE, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The summary presented by Mr. SPARKMAN is as follows:

SUMMARY OF S. 3640—THE URBAN GROWTH AND NEW COMMUNITIES DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1970

The objectives of this bill are to provide for the development of a national urbanization policy and to encourage and support more rational, orderly, efficient, and economic growth and development of our States, metropolitan areas, cities, and towns with emphasis upon the development of new communities and upon inner city development. In order to achieve the objectives, the act establishes a Council on Urban Growth to develop a national urbanization policy, requires the submission to Congress and to the President of a biennial Report on Urban Growth, creates a Community Development Corporation within the Department of Housing and Urban Development to promote and sponsor new community and more orderly urban development, provides for inner city development to augment the supply of housing, and encourages State and regional planning for growth and stabilization.

Title I of the act recognizes the need for a national urbanization policy and specifically outlines the purposes of this policy. A Council on Urban Growth is created within the Executive Office of the President to prepare a biennial Report on Urban Growth, to collect, analyze, and evaluate relevant information, to assess the effects of Federal programs on urban growth, and to assess other public and private efforts to create rational urban growth. The report shall include significant problems encountered as a result of urban growth trends and developments, a review of existing programs and efforts, and recommendations for future programs and policies.

Title II, the Development of New Communities, encourages public and private bodies to undertake community growth and development programs, including the development of new communities, satellite communities, accelerated growth centers, new towns-in-town, and other large scale urban development. The Community Development Corporation is established and authorized to extend financial assistance through loans to eligible developers for feasibility studies, planning, land acquisition and development, construction of essential public works and facilities, and necessary commercial and industrial areas. The Corporation may also provide public service grants for the staffing of essential public facilities and services. Any development undertaken under this title must be economically feasible and must contribute to the orderly growth and development of the area. The developer must provide a sound internal development plan which is consistent with any comprehensive planning in the area and which has received all necessary governmental approvals. The new community guarantee program authorized by title IV of the Housing and Urban Development Act of 1968 is transferred to the Corporation. The Community Development Corporation, as a government corporation within the Department of Housing and Urban Development, is authorized to establish a Community Development Fund, carry out demonstration programs and advise on the compatability of any major Federal installation with the provisions of this act.

Title III provides for inner city development to augment the inventory of housing and essential public services through more rational use of urban land and space. Title I of the Housing Act of 1949 is amended to permit the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to make financial assistance available to local public agencies for rebuilding projects on land which is currently occupied by functionally obsolete or uneconomic uses or which is currently unusable because of natural hazards or inadequate development, though not necessarily "blighted". Grants under this title shall be available for feasibility studies, planning and developing the project, and the acquisition and preparation of land and space.

Title IV, Assistance Planning for State and Regional Growth and Stabilization, amends section 701 of the Housing Act of 1954 to provide grants to States, regional bodies, State boundary commissions and municipal incorporation control agencies to assist in financing the cost of conducting population growth and urban development planning programs. In addition this title provides technical assistance to State and regional agencies engaged in land-use planning and authorizes grants to enable such agencies to purchase open land surrounding urban and metropolitan areas to insure proper growth and development.

Title V of this act includes general provisions relating to relocation requirements and payments, housing priorities for programs assisted, requirements for the utilization of new and improved construction methods and techniques, and advance consent to interstate compacts for mutual assistance in carrying out the objectives of the Act.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 186—INTRODUCTION OF A JOINT RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR A STUDY OF CHARGES FOR THE TRANSPORTATION OF FREIGHT

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, in 1944 the Board of Investigation and Research, established under the National Transportation Act of 1940, made its report to the first session of the 79th Congress. That report, which represents the last major study of the relationship of common carrier cost to our national transportation policy begins with the following introduction:

The economic welfare of the whole country is affected by freight-rate levels and relationships. People want to live where there are opportunities for them to work and prosper. Those opportunities come, directly or indirectly, from the production and distribution of raw materials and manufactured products. Transportation charges determined, to an important degree, the opportunities in any given locality to find profitable markets for the raw materials of the region or to manufacture these materials and distribute the products. In order to provide equal opportunity to utilize to best advantage the human and natural resources of all parts of the country, rates for every transportation service must be fair in relation to the service performed. So, a knowledge of transportation costs and the expression of those costs in rates related to costs are necessary for the proper growth and prosperity of the Nation.

Mr. President, last week the Nader report on the ICC reaffirmed this basic premise when it stated:

A discriminatory rate system results in hidden diseconomies and inefficiencies, affects decisions on what kinds of natural resources to utilize, and on where to locate manufacturing plants—which affects in turn urbanization, pollution and inflation.

More importantly, Mr. President, transportation costs account for from 15 to 20 percent of our gross national product.

Those costs, Mr. President, are reflected in the price every consumer must pay for an automobile, television set, light bulb, or a loaf of bread. The great technologies which have made our Nation the most affluent in the world have often done so at the price of inefficiency. Perhaps, Mr. President, the cost of transportation is an area inefficiently arrived at, inefficiently distributed, and inefficiently adjusted. Mr. President, I say "perhaps" because quite frankly we do not have accurate data necessary for any intelligent assessment of the transportation freight rate structures.

Mr. President, transportation charges by all modes of transportation have been increasing, but this is only one part of a more complex program. Such charges as they have developed over the years have become so complex, conflicting, and contradictory that it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine whether increases on individual commodities are justifiable and the extent to which such charges are discriminatory. This renders oversight difficult. It also deprives us of the opportunity to take advantage of the benefits, now technologically feasible, for intermodal transportation of freight.

Mr. President, the system we have devised in this country for determining the fair and reasonable charge for the shipment of goods is made tremendously complex by the anachronistic system we have for determining the rate a carrier may charge a shipper. For example, Mr. President, the basic rail class rate structure, which is complicated enough, only governs about 5 percent of the freight which travels in this country. Another 10 to 15 percent of rail freight is governed by the so-called exceptions to the classified freight rates. The vast amount of rail freight in this country is governed by commodity rate structures, which are on an individual point-to-point, group-to-group basis. The same situation pertains with respect to the freight rate structures of other regulated modes of transportation.

Because of this, Mr. President, it is easy to understand why the ICC alone received 277,633 tariffs which were published during fiscal year 1969. Some of those tariffs were only two pages long. Others consisted of over 25 pages of very fine print. In its area alone, the ICC during fiscal year 1969 had filed with it over 950,000 pages of rates.

From what I have said, Mr. President, it is evident that a study of the freight rate structures of the various regulated modes of transportation is not only desirable, but absolutely necessary. Last week the Surface Transportation Subcommittee of the Senate Commerce Committee conducted 3 days of hearings on S. 2355, a bill to authorize such a study. As I pointed out during those hearings, I am in complete accord with the goals sought to be accomplished by the bill, S. 2355. However, as I also pointed out, I cannot approve of the implementation of those goals by the creation of yet another independent commission to study and report on the situation.

Mr. President, at the outset, I questioned the wisdom of bypassing the Department of Transportation, the agency we created to serve as a coordinator of the various modes of transportation, and as the mechanism to develop a truly national transportation system. As the hearing progressed, I became convinced there were even more important reasons for designating the Secretary of that Department as our agent to undertake the contemplated study.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am today introducing a joint resolution for myself and on behalf of Senators SCOTT, GRIFFIN, COTTON, and PEARSON which would direct the Department of Transportation to make a comprehensive study of the freight rate structure of all modes of regulated transportation, including maritime and freight forwarders which were not included within the bill, S. 2355.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD immediately after my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWEIKER). The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD, as requested by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, this joint resolution by directing the Department of Transportation to undertake the study would have two principal advantages over having such a study conducted by an independent commission. First, it would reduce leadtime to an absolute minimum and reduce the time required to make the study itself. Second, it would reduce the costs attendant upon such a study.

Although no one knows how long it would take to establish an independent commission, obtain a competent staff and the necessary materials, there can be no doubt that this would be a time-consuming process. Deputy Under Secretary Baker of the Department of Transportation, on the other hand, indicated to us when he was before the subcommittee, that if such a study were undertaken by the Department, it could be gotten underway within 3 or 4 months; and that much of the source material necessary for conducting a comprehensive and thorough study is already on hand and being processed at the Department. For this reason he also indicated his belief that the Department could complete such a study within 1 year.

Mr. President, I am convinced that we need such a report, together with recommendations, and we need it now.

We can get it sooner by utilizing the resources of the Department of Transportation and this fact in and of itself is sufficient to convince me that we should proceed by directing the Secretary of Transportation to undertake the study as would be done under the joint resolution.

Mr. President, I would hope that the Department of Transportations' study would focus on the challenges and the means for developing an appropriate standard for rate regulation in the future, rather than being simply a forum for the airing of grievances concerning inequities in the present freight rate structure.

The challenges of the 1970's are great and we must be equipped to meet them with pragmatic solutions rather than piecemeal promises.

The study envisioned in my joint resolution will give us the facts we need to develop a truly national system of transportation, which makes the most efficient use of all of our available transportation resources.

Finally, Mr. President, the adoption of this joint resolution would complement the mandate put forth by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, Senator WARREN G. MAGNUSON, who in his January 27 letter to the Rules Committee pointed out:

> The committee will undertake a root and branch, systematic evaluation of national transportation policy, to define the needs and goals of the 1970's and beyond and to redirect and guide future policy planning.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 186) providing for a full and complete study of charges for the transportation of freight by all regulated modes of transportation and the submission of recommendations with respect to appropriate standards for determining the lawfulness of such charges and the most effective means of administering such standards, introduced by Mr. PROUTY (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 186

Whereas the freight rate structures of the various modes of transportation as they have developed over the years are conflicting, contradictory, and confusing; and

Whereas in this state there exist virtually unlimited possibilities for the sort of discrimination which it was the intent of Congress to eliminate by the passage of the various regulatory statutes, more specifically referred to hereinafter; and

Whereas to secure the benefits of multimodal transportation now made possible through advances in technology, some way must be found to rationalize the disparate freight rate structures of the various modes; and

Whereas uniform or comparable standards by which to judge the lawfulness of the charges for the transportation of freight by each of the various modes is desirable and would greatly facilitate the free flow of goods transported both domestically and in foreign commerce; and

Whereas the Department of Transportation was created to coordinate the various modes of transportation and as the mechanism to assist in development of a truly National Transportation System in which the most efficient use will be made of all of our transportation instrumentalities: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Transportation acting in cooperation with the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal Maritime Commission and other interested Federal and State agencies shall make a full and complete study of rates and charges for the transportation of freight within the fifty States by the various modes of transportation subject to regulation pursuant to the Interstate Commerce Act, including freight forwarders subject to regulation under part IV thereof, the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, the Shipping Act, 1916, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, and, within one year after the date of enactment of this joint resolution, prepare and submit to the President and the Congress a report and recommendations on:

(1) the extent to which freight rates and other charges for the transportation of freight differ depending upon place of origin, destination, or commodity;

(2) the principal factors underlying such differences;

(3) the standards applied by each of the agencies of the United States Government responsible for the regulation of such rates and charges in passing upon the lawfulness thereof, both in the aggregate and on an individual basis:

(4) the extent to which competition is permitted to and does determine the levels of freight rates and charges under the various regulatory acts above referred to;

(5) the extent of commonality between the standards applied by such regulatory agencies in passing upon the lawfulness of the freight rates and transportation charges of carriers; and

(6) appropriate standards for determining the lawfulness of freight rates and charges for all modes of freight transportation and the most effective means of administering such standard or standards as may be recommended.

SEC. 2. (a) In order to carry out his functions under this resolution, the Secretary is authorized and directed to appoint, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive services, such advisory committees, representative of the divergent interests involved, as he deems appropriate to represent the interests of consumers, shippers, and the transportation modes for the purpose of consultation with and advice to the Secretary. Members of advisory committees appointed under this section, other than those regularly employed by the Federal Government, while attending meetings of such committees or otherwise serving at the request of the Secretary, may be compensated at rates to be fixed by the Secretary but not exceeding $100 per day, and while away from home or regular place of business they may be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, as authorized by section 5703 of title 5, United States Code, for persons in the Government service employed intermittently. Members of such advisory committees shall, for the purposes of chapter 11, title 18, United States Code, be deemed to be special Government employees.

(b) Each department, agency, and instrumentality of the executive branch of the Government, including independent agencies, is authorized and directed to furnish to the Secretary, upon request, such information as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out its functions under this Act.

SEC. 3. (a) For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this resolution, the Secretary, or on the authorization of the Secretary any officer or employee of the Department of Transportation may require, by subpena or otherwise, the production of such books, papers, correspondence, memorandums, contracts, agreements, or other records as the Secretary, or such officer or employee, deems advisable.

(b) In order to carry out the provisions of this resolution, the Secretary or his duly authorized agent shall at all reasonable times have access to, and for the purposes of examination the right to copy, any documentary evidence of any corporation, business firm, institution, or individual having materials or information relevant to the study authorized by this resolution.

(c) The Secretary is authorized to require, by general or special orders, any corporation, business firm, or individual or any class of such corporation, firms, or individuals to file, in such form as the Secretary may prescribe, reports or answers in writing to specific questions relating to the study authorized by this resolution. Such reports and answers shall be made under oath or otherwise, and shall be filed with the Secretary within such reasonable period as the Secretary may prescribe.

(d) Any of the district courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which an inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpena or order of the Secretary or such officer or employee issued under subsection (a) or subsection (c) of this section, issue an order requiring compliance therewith; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

(e) Witnesses summoned pursuant to this section shall be paid the same fees and mileage that are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.

(f) Any information which is reported to or otherwise obtained by the Secretary or such officer or employee under this section and which contains or relates to a trade secret or other matter referred to in section 1905 of title 18 of the United States Code, shall not be disclosed except to other officers or employees of the Federal Government for their use in carrying out this resolution. Nothing in the preceding sentence shall authorize the withholding of information by the Secretary (or any officer or employee under his control) from the duly authorized committees of the Congress.

(g) In carrying out his functions under this section, the Secretary shall to the maximum possible extent avoid the imposition of any requirements for reports, information, or other material from carriers subject to economic regulation by the Civil Aeronautics Board, the Federal Maritime Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission which duplicates the requirements by any of these agencies.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any monies in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Secretary of Transportation not to exceed $750,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 187—INTRODUCTION OF A JOINT RESOLUTION TO AUTHORIZE THE PRESIDENT TO DESIGNATE THE THIRD SUNDAY IN JUNE OF EACH YEAR AS FATHER'S DAY

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce a Senate joint resolution which will authorize the President to designate the third Sunday in June of each year as Father's Day.

The Congress took a similar action in 1966, when Public Law 450 officially proclaimed Sunday, June 19 of that year, as Father's Day. No resolution permanently recognizing Father's Day has been passed, although Mother's Day has been recognized on a continuing basis since May 8, 1914.

Mr. President, it is my view that fathers deserve this official recognition. It seems a small thing to do, considering the burdens and responsibilities placed upon them.

I hope that this resolution will receive prompt attention, and that the Senate will see fit to approve it when it comes before this body for passage.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the joint resolution be printed at the conclusion of my remarks; and that the joint resolution be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWEIKER). The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 187) to authorize the President to designate the third Sunday in June of each year as Father's Day, introduced by Mr. HRUSKA, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S.J. RES. 187

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the third Sunday in June of each year is hereby designated as "Father's Day". The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on the appropriate Government officials to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on such day, inviting the governments of the States and communities and the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate ceremonies, and urging our people to offer public and private expressions of such day to the abiding love and gratitude which they bear for their fathers.

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS

S. 3417

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3417, to amend the Gun Control Act of 1968 to permit interstate transportation and shipment of firearms that are limited to use for sporting purposes and target competition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRANSTON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3551

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the name of the Senator from New York (Mr. GOODELL) be added as a cosponsor of S. 3551 concerning the installation of sanitation devices in railroad cars to prevent the discharge from such cars of sewage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONDALE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

S. 3598

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, at the next printing, the names of the Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS) and the Senator from Oregon (Mr. HATFIELD) be added as cosponsors of S. 3598, to amend section 32(e) of title III of the Bankhead-Jones Farm Tenant Act, as amended, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to furnish financial assistance in carrying out plans for works of improvement for land conservation and utilization, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWEIKER). Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 376—RESOLUTION SUBMITTED AUTHORIZING THE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE TO STUDY RESEARCH ACTIVITIES CONDUCTED TO ASCERTAIN THE CAUSES AND DEVELOP CURES TO ELIMINATE CANCER

Mr. YARBOROUGH (for himself, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. BAYH, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. BYRD of West Virginia, Mr. CANNON, Mr. CASE, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FONG, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. GOODELL, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HART, Mr.

HARTKE, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. METCALF, Mr. MONDALE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MURPHY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NELSON, Mr. PACKWOOD, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PELL, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mrs. SMITH of Maine, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and Mr. YOUNG of Ohio) submitted a resolution (S. Res. 376) authorizing the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to study research activities conducted to ascertain the causes and develop cures to eliminate cancer, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

(The remarks of Mr. YARBOROUGH when he submitted the resolution appear earlier in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

SENATE RESOLUTION 377—RESOLUTION SUBMITTED RELATING TO THE CONDUCT OF COMMITTEE BUSINESS WHILE THE SENATE IS IN SESSION

Mr. LONG submitted a resolution (S. Res. 377) relating to the conduct of committee business while the Senate is in session, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(The remarks of Mr. LONG when he submitted the resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

SENATE RESOLUTION 378—RESOLUTION SUBMITTED RELATING TO THE DETERMINATION OF THE PRESENCE OF A QUORUM

Mr. LONG submitted a resolution (S. Res. 378) relating to the determination of the presence of a quorum, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(The remarks of Mr. LONG when he submitted the resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

SENATE RESOLUTION 379—RESOLUTION SUBMITTED RELATING TO THE RECORDING OF VOTES OF ABSENT SENATORS

Mr. LONG submitted a resolution (S. Res. 379) relating to the recording of votes of absent Senators, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(The remarks of Mr. LONG when he submitted the resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

SENATE RESOLUTION 380—RESOLUTION SUBMITTED RELATING TO THE RECORDING OF VOTES WHEN A LIVE PAIR HAS BEEN ENTERED INTO

Mr. LONG submitted a resolution (S. Res. 380) relating to the recording of votes when a live pair has been entered into, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(The remarks of Mr. LONG when he submitted the resolution appear later in the RECORD under the appropriate heading.)

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF A FEDERAL BROKER-DEALER INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Securities of the Committee on Banking and Currency will hold hearings on S. 2348, a bill to establish a Federal Broker-Dealer Insurance Corporation.

The hearings will be held on Thursday and Friday, April 16 and 17, 1970, and will begin at 10 a.m., in room 5302, New Senate Office Building.

Persons desiring to testify or to submit written statements in connection with these hearings should notify Mr. Stephen J. Paradise, assistant counsel, Senate Banking and Currency Committee, room 5300, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510; telephone 225–7391.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS OF SENATORS AS IN LEGISLATIVE SESSION

TWENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF SERVICE OF SENATOR YOUNG OF NORTH DAKOTA

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, on Thursday of last week several Senators paid tribute to my colleague from North Dakota, the Honorable MILTON R. YOUNG, upon serving 25 years in the U.S. Senate. I was in North Dakota at the time, but would now like to add my congratulations.

Few men have served in this great body for that length of time, and this is not only a mark of distinction for Senator YOUNG, but it is also a tribute to the State of North Dakota. It is with pleasure that I join with the others to say: Congratulations, MILT.

Mr. FONG. Mr. President, today marks 25 years and 6 days that my distinguished colleague and good friend, the senior Senator from North Dakota, MILTON R. YOUNG, has served in the U.S. Senate.

On that rare and remarkable record, I extend my warmest congratulations and best wishes and pay tribute to him in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I congratulate the people of North Dakota, too, for their perception and intelligence in choosing MILT YOUNG to represent them for a quarter century in our Nation's highest legislative body. That is tribute of the highest kind—and it is entirely deserved.

During his tenure in the Senate, MILT YOUNG has risen to positions of leadership. He is the top ranking Republican on the Senate Appropriations Committee, regarded as one of the most influential committees in the Senate. He is the second ranking Republican on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which has jurisdiction over one of America's basic industries. He has been chosen by his fellow Republicans since 1948 to serve as secretary of the Senate Republican conference committee.

Self-effacing, quite, and modest, MILT YOUNG is a hardworking, commonsense Senator. His knowledge, his understanding, and his integrity have won him the respect of all of us who serve with him.

It is no wonder North Dakotans have elected and reelected him.

Appointed to the Senate in March 1945, MILT YOUNG was first elected on June 25, 1946, to fill out the remaining term ending January 3, 1951. He was reelected November 25, 1950, November 6, 1956, November 6, 1962, and November 5, 1968, for full 6-year terms.

In the 1968 election, he received the highest percentage of vote of any Republican Senator in the Nation who had to run against an opponent.

MILT YOUNG has carried every county in North Dakota in seven different statewide elections, losing only three counties in two other statewide elections.

He is a formidable vote-getter. Those of us from other States can be glad we do not have to run against him.

The 25 years spanning MILT YOUNG's tenure have seen many hotly debated issues brought up on the floor of the Senate and many grave crises. Through it all, MILT YOUNG has displayed the calm good judgment and down-to-earth reasoning that have earned him the respect and affection of his colleagues. He is a true son of the Midwest heartland of America, and he is a credit to his State and Nation.

MILT YOUNG has been a fine and valued friend to me ever since I came to the Senate in 1959, following our first statehood election. In fact, MILT YOUNG voted for statehood for Hawaii and so in part is responsible for my being here.

For all his many kindnesses and for his wise counsel, I take this opportunity to express my heartfelt thanks and warmest aloha.

LEGISLATIVE VICTORY FOR INNOCENT VICTIMS OF CRIME; SENATE PASSES BILL FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the passage of my bill to compensate innocent victims of crime in the District of Columbia yesterday is a great victory for all the citizens who reside here and who visit here. The distinguished and able Senator from Maryland (Mr. TYDINGS) is to be commended for his leadership and effective labor in seeking greater justice in the District of Columbia. As chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, he has devoted countless hours of his time to legislation which will provide the District of Columbia greater security, greater protection from the ravages of crime, and greater justice for all citizens who reside in or visit this great Nation's Capital. Under the able leadership of Senator TYDINGS, the committee has done an outstanding job, and every member is to be commended for his efforts in behalf of law, order, and justice.

The passage by the Senate yesterday of my District of Columbia Criminal Injuries Compensation Act is a significant legislative victory in my long fight to establish a program of compensation for victims of crime in Federal jurisdictions.

Our law's failure to compensate innocent victims of crime has disturbed me for many years. As a district judge in Texas over 30 years ago, I tried many criminal cases. The law is properly solicitous of the rights of the person accused of committing a crime. These vital constitutional protections are fundamental to justice in our society. However, all of our attention has been devoted to the apprehension, trial, and treatment of the criminal. I believe that our society is great enough to also extend justice to the innocent victim of crime by providing him compensation for the injury or death he suffers from society's failure to protect him. This irony of our law, which ignores the innocent victim while treating the aggressor as fairly and justly as we possibly can, bothered me as a trial judge, and I have been conscious of this injustice for all these years. In 1965 I seized upon an idea as old as history itself, but only recently revived in modern systems of law: Government compensation of innocent victims of crime.

The justification for a program of compensation is compelling.

The fundamental purpose of any government is to protect its citizens from injury. Order and security are fundamental to any society, but in civilized nations justice is also a major goal. Our Nation is founded on the principle that the individual is entitled to protection, not only from foreign and domestic enemies, but from unjust treatment by the Government itself.

As we have progressed to a more civilized state, citizens are obliged to rely almost entirely upon the Government for protection from criminal injuries. The law-abiding citizen must go forth unarmed and should have confidence that the institutionalized protections will save him from injury.

Our society has assumed this responsibility of protecting citizens from criminal injuries. When it fails to fulfill this duty, it is only just that the State should absorb at least some of the cost of the injury which results from its failure of protection.

While the idea of victim compensation was contained in the Code of Hammurabi Mosaic Law, and in many ancient societies, the first modern system of victim compensation was adopted in New Zealand in 1963, and the second in Great Britain in 1964.

When I heard of this action by these nations, I realized that the time had come for this idea, and in 1965 I introduced S. 2155, the first bill ever introduced in either House of Congress to meet this problem. This was before any State in our Nation had acted to compensate victims of crime. My proposal was to establish a Federal Violent Crimes Compensation Commission to provide up to $25,000 compensation for victims of bodily injury or death.

In January 1967, in the first session of the 90th Congress, I again introduced such a bill, S. 646, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Act of 1967, which was a refined version of my original bill.

In this Congress I introduced two bills on the subject. The first on January 15, 1969, is S. 9, which would apply to all areas in which the Federal Government exercises general police power—the District of Columbia and the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States. Later, on September 19, 1969, I introduced S. 2936, which would apply only to the District of Columbia. While I think this law should have the broadest possible application, the situation in the District seemed to me to be critical. In effect, S. 2936, the District of Columbia bill, is carved out of the larger jurisdiction of S. 9.

National interest in these plans to compensate victims of crime is growing. Several States have already acted. California instituted a plan in 1965 as a part of their welfare system. New York State enacted a compensation plan in 1966, then Hawaii and Massachusetts established theirs in 1967. Maryland approved a compensation plan in 1968.

The reason why Congress must act in the District of Columbia to compensate victims of crime is that we are responsible to these citizens for their police protection, and when we fail in that responsibility, we must assist the innocent by relieving him of some of the tremendous economic burden thrust upon him by the criminal's act of violence.

The bill as passed by the Senate has a special provision whereby resident victims will be compensated from District funds, and only visitors to our Nation's Capital will be compensated by funds from the General Treasury. The taxes of residents will be used to compensate residents, and the taxes of all citizens will compensate visitors to our Capital. This is a fair and just provision.

Compensation in this program will only be paid to those victims who suffer bodily injury as a result of a specified violent criminal act, or to the dependents of those who suffer death. Property loss is not covered because the most serious and most crushing loss is the loss of health or life. Such items as actual medical and hospital expenses and loss of earnings are compensable. To absorb these expenses is the least we can do for the innocent victim whom we have failed to protect from harm.

This plan is not dependent upon conviction of the aggressor. The commission will determine whether the injury was caused by a criminal act and make an award even though the aggressor was not apprehended, or was insane, drunk or a juvenile.

An important provision of the legislation directs the commission to consider whether the person making the claim contributed to his own injury or death, and the commission may refuse to make an award, or reduce the amount of the award, to take the victim's conduct into account. Thus, the injured participant in a barroom brawl will not be compensated. However, the good Samaritan, injured when he goes to the aid of another, or helps the police, will be compensated.

The bill contains a limitation of $25,000 on awards. In the case of death or permanent disability, the actual monetary loss will be much greater than this. However, this limit is a necessary one as we are establishing a new program and must use our limited funds to relieve the most pressing claims for compensation.

It is appropriate that Congress should be in the forefront of this movement to provide the victims of crime their share of justice under our laws. This program administered in the District of Columbia should be an example to all those States which have not yet enacted a program of victim compensation. As the Federal Government exercises police power in this jurisdiction, the State exercise that power in each of their jurisdictions and should fulfill their responsibility to those victims injured by their failure of protection from criminal injury.

The Senate's action on this measure, along with the other programs and provisions important to the District of Columbia, contained in this omnibus crime bill provides me with a great sense of achievement. I have fought this battle since 1965, and passage of the bill by the Senate substantiates my firm conviction that this program is necessary for the achievement of a full measure of justice in our Nation's Capital.

EMERGENCY EXPENSE CREDIT FOR THE POOR

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I welcome this opportunity to comment on one of the important steps taken by the Office of Economic Opportunity in meeting a frequent problem of the poor—lack of credit to enable them to cover emergency expenses.

This problem always afflicts the poor but is particularly severe in times of high interest rates and tight money. Frequently, the poor have been forced to borrow from loan sharks at extortionate interest rates. Or they are forced to deal with easy credit merchants and end up paying three or four times the value of the purchased goods.

Because of this situation, I introduced legislation, S. 2259, to assist in the establishment of credit unions in poor areas. The presence of credit unions in poor rural and urban neighborhoods can bring into such areas the basic ingredient most lacking—access to legitimate money and credit. I am hopeful that Congress will take prompt action on S. 2259.

However, in the interim, thoughtful steps must be taken to meet this problem. The Office of Economic Opportunity has taken such steps and is to be applauded. In the District of Columbia, the Office of Economic Opportunity through the United Planning Organization, the local community action agency for the District, has been assisting nine local community credit unions. Over the past 5 years these credit unions have loaned a total of $4.3 million to more than 16,000 residents of the city's ghetto areas.

These OEO-advocated credit unions have given the District's residents an opportunity to take out loans to pay rent, buy necessities and consolidate debts—problems which can achieve emergency proportions if funds are not available. The average loan is about $300 and can often rescue a family from eviction or outfit children for school attendance or pay for groceries.

During the next 5 years, the United Planning Organization will be phasing out its support of the credit unions, as they become self-supporting. This is the strongest proof possible that these credit unions can make it on their own.

I commend to the attention of Senators a recent article published recently in the Washington Star which discusses these credit unions. I believe it is a fine example of how the Office of Economic Opportunity's local community action programs can work to meet the urgent needs of the poor.

I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLUM CREDIT UNIONS QUIETLY GIVE AID TO 16,000 OF POOR

(By Duncan Spencer)

Almost unheralded, nine local community credit unions here have loaned a total of $4.3 million to more than 16,000 residents of Washington's ghetto areas in the last five years.

The credit unions, unvarnished and stuck in crowded storefront community centers throughout the city, are beginning to feel confident that this is one—perhaps the only one—of the community-oriented government projects to help the poor that is going to survive on its own.

Yesterday at the first "open house" of the American Federation of Community Credit Unions, there were expressed emotions of pride and an unexpressed feeling that the ghetto credit union movement is on the map.

"The trouble is," said Miss Shirley Grasty, federation managing director, "we never make any news."

Eight of the nine community credit unions here were started in 1965 under the aegis of the United Planning Organization, and were promptly lost from public view in the welter of acronymic projects that sprang almost daily from the Johnson administration's war on poverty.

Basically, a credit union is an unglamorous thing. A place where people place their savings and borrow money at lower rates because they are nonprofit, special interest institutions aimed at specific groups of people.

MOVEMENT IS UNIQUE

But the community credit union idea—which is basically just a way of providing the poor a shelter from easy-credit shysters and loan sharks—is unique in that it is open to anyone who lives in the nine Washington areas in which they serve. It was also the first such government-sponsored experiment in the U.S., and still is the primary such project.

Add to the basic gray of financial matters the dull routine of a ghetto family's constant battle with debt, and it's easy to understand Miss Grasty's remark.

But the fact remains that the credit unions are opposed by no important black radical group, no conservative group, and no one in between.

UPO and the Office of Economic Opportunity have assured the credit union leaders that their funds (backing of about $30,000 a year for each union's expenses) will not be subject to a general 20 percent anti-inflation cutback asked by the Nixon administration.

The talk yesterday at the federation gathering was remarkably free of rhetoric. The facts and figures spoke of gradually rising community participation in spite of a ban on advertising only recently lifted. And the assets of the separate unions have been doubling yearly.

ROBBERY CONSTANT PERIL

Naturally, running a credit union in Washington's depressed areas has its drawbacks. Robbery is a constant menace (in December, for instance, a single union was robbed twice), the delinquency rate on loans is high, and the unions are often unable to help the people who need financial aid the most.

A majority of the loans made are unsecured, collection is often difficult, and many borrowers are turned away.

But an individual can join one of the unions for a fee of 25 cents, and many people on welfare join merely to have a place to cash their checks without paying the usual 50-cent cashing charges at liquor stores and banks.

The federation estimates that the unions have a potential membership of 65,000, and hopes that the idea will spread nationally and eventually provide backing for black entrepreneurship on a large-scale enabling individual credit unions to accept poorer and riskier loan seekers.

WELFARE CHECK PLAN URGED

The federation decided yesterday to ask the federal government to allow members' welfare checks to be paid directly to the credit unions, a move that would save the government, as well as the recipients, money.

Mrs. Gheretine Wilson, president of Hospitality House Community Credit Union on H Street NE, explained that most of loans are made for things more affluent people would never think of borrowing for. The most frequent loans are to pay rent, to buy clothes, and to consolidate debts, she said. The average loan is about $300, and the average individual investment in the credit union, $90.

This may seem small potatoes to middle-income people, Mrs. Wilson pointed out, but the number of individuals is showing a steady rise.

UPO plans to phase out its support of the credit union scheme over the next five years, cutting back a percentage each year as the unions themselves grow able to pay their own expenses.

"This is the only program I know of where the end of government funding will be a mark of success," Miss Grasty said.

EARL RUDDER: SOLDIER, STATESMAN, AND EDUCATOR

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, on March 23, 1970, Gen. Earl Rudder, president of Texas A. & M. University, died at the age of 59. During his life, General Rudder distinguished himself as a military leader, State official, community leader, and educator.

During World War II, Earl Rudder organized and trained the 2d Ranger Battalion which was given the dangerous assignment of scaling the cliffs of Pointe du Hoe during the D-Day invasion of Normandy. At the time of this heroic action, General Rudder, than a lieutenant colonel, was only 34. His leadership prompted the highest praise the Commander of the U.S. Forces in Europe, Gen. Omar Bradley, could give. During his service in World War II, he was wounded twice and received numerous decorations, including the Legion of Merit, Silver Star Medal, Bronze Star Medal with oak leaf cluster, the Purple Heart with oak leaf cluster, Legion of Honor with Croix de Guerre and palm—France— Order of Leopold with Croix de Guerre and palm—Belgium—and the Distinguished Service Medal. He was promoted to the rank of major general in the U.S. Army Reserve in 1956 and commanded the 90th Infantry Division, USAR, from 1954 until the division was deactivated.

After World II, Gen. Earl Rudder entered into a career of service to his community and his State. From 1946 to 1952 he served as mayor of his hometown of Brady, Tex. From 1955 to 1958, he served as State land commissioner of Texas and as chairman of the veterans land board. He took over the veterans land board at a time when it was riddled with scandal. Through his efforts and efficient management, he cleaned up the scandal and reestablished the veterans land board as an efficient and effective State agency.

In 1958, General Rudder answered the call of his alma mater, Texas A. & M. University, and assumed the position of vice president. In 1959, he became president of Texas A. & M. and held this position until his death. During his 10 years as president, General Rudder led Texas A. & M. into a new era of growth and progress. When he became president the enrollment of Texas A. & M. was approximately 7,500 students. This year the enrollment has reached 14,000.

Despite the many problems associated with the management of a large university and the many demands made on General Rudder's time, he still found time to take part in the affairs of his community. Recently, he had been devoting much of his efforts toward obtaining the appropriations necessary to commence work on the Millican Dam and Reservoir project which is so important to the people of Brazos Valley of south Texas. His death is a great blow to the university, community, and State that he loved and served so well.

Inscribed upon the statue of another great president of Texas A. & M. are the words, "Soldier, Statesman, and Knightly Gentleman." General Rudder was all of these things. He will be missed by all whose lives he touched.

NOMINATION OF G. HARROLD CARSWELL TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by William A. Mullen, editor of the Pompano Beach, Fla., Sun-Sentinel. The editorial is a further testament that no case has been presented against the nomination of G. Harrold Carswell to the Supreme Court of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BICKERING OVER CARSWELL ANTI-MAN OR ANTI-SOUTH?

(By William A. Mullen)

As the battle for control of the U.S. Supreme Court rages over the nomination of Federal Judge Harrold Carswell as associate justice, the opposition debate gets less and less concerned with fact.

The latest gambit is the charge raised by

Sen. Joseph Tydings, D-Md., leader of the anti-Carswell forces, that endorsement of the Tallahassee-based federal appeals judge by an esteemed colleague had been withdrawn over racial conflict.

Senator Tydings implied that Judge Carswell had failed to disclose that former Chief Judge Elbert Tuttle of the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals, had rescinded his endorsement of Judge Carswell.

The purported reason was Judge Carswell's involvement in the organization of an all-White private club.

At this writing, there has been no confirmation from Judge Tuttle that he intended to reverse his position on the Carswell nomination. Nothing has been said by him about the racial overtones. All that is definitely known is that Judge Tuttle informed Judge Carswell by telephone that he would not be able to testify in his behalf before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

But the Tydings insinuations perpetuate the racial allegations against Judge Carswell, to which have been added contentions by the United Steelworkers Union, AFL-CIO, that confirmation of President Nixon's nominee would indicate that "bigotry and incompetence" would not disqualify a man for the court.

The union, Senator Tydings, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., Sen. Edward Brooke, R-Mass., the Senate's only Negro member, and a number of others opposing Judge Carswell for supposed bigotry all conveniently overlook an entry in the Feb. 16 Congressional Record that records support of the jurist by the former president of the Cleveland, Ohio, chapter of the National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP).

The entry is a letter to the editor published in the Cleveland Plain Dealer and written by Chester Gillespie, presently a member of the chapter's executive committee, urging that unless the NAACP "has very strong evidence against Judge Carswell," it should compromise and support Mr. Nixon's appointment.

The letter further states, in part:

"He (Judge Carswell) has made some mistakes in his several rulings, but he ruled a Negro must be served in a barber shop and that Negroes must be served in public restaurants, both in the State of Florida and his White friends were unhappy about these ruling and the barber closed his shop.

"Judge Carswell should be promptly confirmed so the court can function as the law requires and for the good and welfare of America. We cannot always get everything we desire."

That admonition is wasted upon the liberals who have shown they will fight any Southern conservative nomination, merely because of it being Southern and conservative.

In so doing, they are wholly unrealistic about giving proper regional and philosophical balance to the nation's highest court.

Other than Associate Justice Hugo Black, no southerner is on the bench, and he is 84 years old. Should his place in the court be vacated, the South would be without a voice in the court where a number of cases are brought directly against the South.

The Court's only Negro justice, Thurgood Marshall, was born in Maryland, but his appointment was from New York. And he could hardly be regarded as a Southern conservative.

Three of the jurists are from the Northeast, the citadel of liberalism; one is from Ohio and another from Colorado.

Chief Justice Warren Burger resided in Virginia at the time of his appointment, but he is a native Minnesotan.

We believe Senator Tydings, et al., are more in opposition to President Nixon's intention of having, properly, more southern representation on the bench than they are against Judge Carswell, per se.

They would be wiser to heed Mr. Gillespie's views and his counsel that they cannot always get everything they desire.

ALICEAN STUDY CLUB URGES 100,000 ACRE BIG THICKET

Mr. YARBOROUGH. Mr. President, the Big Thicket National Park, proposed to be established by my bill, S. 4, has been endorsed by numerous groups and individuals throughout Texas and the United States.

An overwhelming majority of the groups and individuals have urged that the Big Thicket National Park include at least 100,000 acres.

These groups understand that a sufficiently large area is necessary for the preservation of nature's bountiful gift of animal life to the Big Thicket. The remote, wild character of the Big Thicket makes it an attractive haven for all forms of wildlife, which find in its dense forests an abundant food supply. The mingling of species which lends so much interest to the plant life of the Thicket is reflected in an intriguing diversity of its animal inhabitants.

Among the larger mammals are the Texas white tail deer, both red and gray fox, raccoon, ringtail, bobcat, mountain lion, and on occasion, black bear. Both the jaguar and ocelot of Mexico were formerly sighted, and there are those who believe these beautiful cats are still present. One of the most interesting animals in the Thicket is the shy, timorous, and ever-present armadillo. Lesser mammals range from rare beaver to abundant gray, flying, and fox squirrels, cotton tails, muskrats, and of course, multitudinous smaller rodents.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolution of the Alicean Study Club of Alice, Tex., at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas, the Big Thicket is a refuge for rare species of plant and animal life; and

Whereas, exploitation of the area now threatens the existence of the Big Thicket as an ecological unit; and

Whereas, 300 bird species make the Big Thicket their home year-round while countless other migratory birds visit the area; therefore

Be it resolved that the Alicean Club of Alice, Texas urges the preservation of at least 100,000 acres containing the most unique areas of the Big Thicket, these areas to be connected by environmental corridors; and

Be it further resolved that the Interior and Insular Affairs Committee of the Senate of the United States be requested to set immediate hearings on S. 4 which would create a Big Thicket National Area.

MRS. PATRICK H. FRERKING,
President.

WATER POLLUTION

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, the problem of water pollution is a major concern to all Americans, and it is the object of a determined attack by this administration.

Much of the national concern focuses upon pollution arising from the normal operations of our cities and our commercial processes, both agricultural and industrial.

But we should not lose sight of another kind of pollution, the pollution that results from accidents on or around water.

Consider, for example, the problem of oil spills.

A panel appointed by President Johnson came up with the grim estimate that by 1980 there will be a major oil spill at least once a year. This panel was considering spills resulting from oil transportation, as well as from offshore drilling.

So far we in America have been very lucky. We have not experienced a spill of major proportions.

In saying this I am not minimizing the unpleasantness and loss resulting from the blowout around the drilling rig in the Santa Barbara Channel.

The blowout was a disaster for that community. Its damages should not be underestimated or forgiven. But nor should we delude ourselves by thinking we have seen the worst that oil spillage can bring.

During the 2 weeks of maximum leakage, a total of 7,000 barrels of oil spilled into the Santa Barbara Channel.

In contrast, when the tanker Torrey Canyon broke up off the Scilly Isles along the south coast of England, it spilled 850,000 barrels into the water and onto the beaches. The Torrey Canyon disaster involved approximately 120 times more oil than the Santa Barbara leak.

Even the Torrey Canyon disaster may be eclipsed by a future spill. Last year a Shell oil tanker returning empty from its maiden voyage sank off the West Coast of Africa. This tanker, the Marpessa, had a capacity of 206,000 dead weight tons. Had the Marpessa been loaded with crude oil when she sank she would have dumped over 1.3 million barrels.

The largest tanker in operation is of 306,000 dead weight tons capacity. This ship could spill nearly 2 million barrels.

The Japanese are preparing to build a tanker of 420,000 dead weight tons capacity. This tanker will be able to spill 2.7 million barrels. That is over 113 million gallons of crude oil on one tanker.

Another way of getting an idea of the relative sizes of the new tanker is to compare them with other well-known ships. The tanker Manhattan, which recently navigated the icepacked northwest passage, is of 115,000 dead weight tons capacity. It is considered a "medium" tanker. But the majestic Queen Mary was only 80,000 tons.

The point is clear. When it comes to accidental pollution, we have not seen anything yet. And if the Presidential panel is correct—if we can expect a major spill each year by 1980—we had better start thinking of this problem as a major facet of our total water pollution problem.

But as is the case with so many environment problems, we should note that our problems stem from developments we do not deplore.

In just 30 years seaborne oil commerce has increased from 84 million tons to 893 million tons. Today it represents 60 percent of the world's ocean commerce.

The seaways are crisscrossed by tank-ers because the oil consumption worldwide has been rising by almost 7 percent per year for the last two decades. This is evidence of healthy economic growth.

Further, the spectacular growth in the size of tankers may be a kind of blessing in disguise. Certainly we should not allow ourselves to be bewitched by statistics of size. If all the world's oil were shipped in small tankers, the congestion in the shipping lanes and ports would be very much worse—and more dangerous—than it is today. The big tanker of the World War II period—the T–2—had a capacity of 16,000 dead weight tons—about one-tenth the capacity of the Manhattan. Imagine the congestion—and collisions—if all oil were carried in 16,000 ton tankers.

But even recognizing these facts, we must also recognize that the pollution potential is great enough to warrant a sense of urgency. One out of every five vessels trading along the Atlantic coast carries oil as its principle cargo. We should be ready for the worst along all our coasts and along our internal waterways.

Many people are already deeply concerned about this. It is easy to understand why the citizens down east have some serious anxieties concerning the plan to locate some oil terminals and refineries on the coast at Machiasport, Maine.

It has been estimated that a Torrey Canyon-type accident near Machiasport could dump enough oil to form a slick 24-feet wide and long enough to reach from Halifax, Nova Scotia to Boston.

The threat of oil spills is especially serious along the Maine coast, because so many persons there earn their living from the sea. In that area there is an annual income of $1.2 million from marine worms, $1.3 million from fishing, $2 million from shrimp, and $15 million from lobsters. All of this could be endangered by oil spills.

The problems now confronting the people of Maine should be considered by all Americans, because all Americans have a stake in preserving our inland and coastal waters. The first thing we need to do is assess the scope of the activity that can be considered potentially dangerous in terms of water pollution accidents.

In the 12 month period beginning in June 1965, there were over 50,000 visits to U.S. ports by medium-size and large ocean-going vessels with a cumulative capacity of almost 300 million tons of potentially polluting materials.

In addition domestic coastal trade from one American port to another involves another 80 million tons of potential pollutants.

Finally, potential pollutants are moved in large quantities on America's 25,000 mile network of inland waterways. In 1964, 188 million tons of oil and other potentially hazardous materials were transported on these waterways. A single movement of petroleum on the Mississippi-Ohio river routes involved a tow 1,180 feet long carrying 277,000 barrels of oil.

Further, various potential pollutants are moved, loaded and unloaded on or around water.

America is laced by approximately 200,000 miles of pipelines which in 1965 carried more than 1 billion tons of oil and other hazardous substances. These pipelines operate at pressures of up to 1,000 pounds per square inch.

Many of these lines are concentrated near heavily populated areas.

And many lines run through or across navigable waterways and reservoir systems.

Accidental puncture, cracked welds and corrosion all contribute pollution where it is most harmful.

America has already experienced many oil transport problems which have not received widespread publicity. Here are some examples:

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers estimates that there were over 2,000 oil spills within U.S. waters in 1966, of which 40 percent came from landbased facilities.

The U.S. Coast Guard reported 371 "cases of record" for 1966 of which 279 involved vessels—143 U.S. flag and 86 foreign flag. By vessel category the 279 incidents involved 49 tankers, 56 barges, 18 dry cargo vessels, 91 naval vessels, and 15 vessels of other categories.

The California State Department of Fish and Game reported 181 oil spills during 1966 in the Los Angeles and Long Beach areas alone, of which 59 were from merchant vessels, 19 from landbased facilities, and 67 from naval vessels.

In January of 1966, the tanker Chelwood Beacon, was grounded off Sandy Hook, N.J. The 50,000 tons of crude oil in her tanks, fortunately saved, menaced the Port of New York and the coastlines of New York and New Jersey.

In June of 1966, the British tanker, Alva Cape, disgorged 23,000 tons of naphtha into Arthur Kill—New York area—after colliding with the tanker, Texaco Massachusetts.

In April of 1967, about 5,000 gallons of gasoline were spilled from a barge which struck a bridge pier in the Mississippi River at Chester, Ill.

In December of 1966, about 120,000 gallons of oil were spilled when an oil barge hit a sunken obstacle in the Illinois River.

A joint study produced by the Departments of Interior and Transportation has listed these additional examples of other kinds of accidental pollution:

1967, Cape Cod National Seashore, Massachusetts. Several large slicks of oil material contaminated about 30 miles of coastline, including recreational beaches. Ducks and other waterfowl were killed. The source of the oil was not determined.

1965, Mississippi River, Louisiana. A hurricane caused the sinking of a barge loaded with 600 tons of chlorine. Infirm patients in the area were evacuated during salvage.

1965, Spring Creek, Missouri. Railroad tank cars, containing 20,000 gallons of cresylic acid and 40,000 gallons of high octane gasoline, were derailed and spilled their contents into the creek. Fish were killed and groundwater supplies contaminated. Downstream water users were notified and further damages were averted.

1963, Minnesota-Mississippi Rivers. Storage tanks ruptured and 2,500,000 gallons of crude soybean oil and 500,000 gallons of salad oil spilled. Two thousand ducks were killed and recreation and wildlife areas were fouled for 130 river miles downstream.

1963, Chattahoochee River, near Atlanta, Georgia. A pipeline burst, spewing an estimated 60,000 gallons of kerosene into the river 5 miles above one of Atlanta's water supply intakes. The river was polluted for three weeks and a plant supplying one-fourth of Atlanta's water was taken out of service for 2 days. Greatly increased chemical treatment of the water was needed.

1963, Coosa River, Alabama. A tractor-trailer hit a bridge and spilled 25 tons of barium carbonate. Downstream water supplies were threatened.

1961, Illinois River, Peoria, Illinois. A hose was ruptured while unloading anhydrous ammonia from a barge. Forty-two persons were hospitalized. Five million fish were killed.

1960, Mississippi River, Louisiana. Industry drained several tons of phenol into the river near Baton Rouge. Water supplies for New Orleans and nearby communities were contaminated.

The danger of accidental water pollution is manifold. The first thing we used to do is to make the danger manifiest to the American people so they will devote to it a proper portion of their environmental concern.

But after arousing public concern, what is to be done?

Regarding ship design and construction, we need more research aimed at improving tanker vessels and barges. This should include examination of ways of improving existing vessels.

Regarding ship movement, there should be a constant review of all procedures and guidance systems that help prevent accidents.

Further, we need strict policing of prohibited discharge zones and of loading and unloading procedures.

The problem of preventing pollution from vessels is complicated by the fact that a diminishing fraction of the tankers entering American waters are under American registry.

Thus we need to seek increasing international cooperation in setting and enforcing standards.

With regard to pipeline movements and storage facilities, there should be an active program of Government interest and incentives regarding technical improvements.

Work is now in progress on the development of a collection agent for spilled oil and other pollutants. Such an agent will be poured on a slick, causing it to agglomerate into a gel which can be skimmed from the water's surface. The Government should encourage research relating to such products.

Further, we need a continuing review of procedures used in offshore drilling and production.

The recent fire and oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico indicates that engineering talent should be employed in devising new mechanisms for shutting down flowing wells in the event of an accident. It should be understood, however, that the problems of controlling these leaks vary with the type of production involved.

Flowing wells present problems quite different from those of a well requiring artificial lifting of the oil. Those wells requiring a method of artificial lifting, whether by gas injection, water flooding or pumping, are generally more easily controlled since the rate of spill may be stopped or greatly diminished simply by shutting off the source of artificial lift.

Flowing wells, on the other hand, have many producing advantages, but these are offset to some extent by control problems. I am confident, however, that the State of the art is sufficiently advanced that unresolved control problems can be resolved without any major disruption or interdiction or production or development of producing fields.

Needless to say, since human beings are in control of drilling and producing facilities, human errors will occur. Thus we should emphasize research that will lessen the number of human errors and that will minimize the damage caused by whatever errors do occur.

Technology has posed some serious threats to our society. Now technology must be used to eliminate these threats.

Until we achieve the required technology, we should be especially careful to insist on a full exercise of the Government's enforcement powers to protect us from environment damage caused by offshore operations.

Secretary of the Interior Walter J. Hickel, speaking on March 12 at a New Orleans news conference, reported that the current oil problems in the Gulf of Mexico are coming from operations that do not meet Federal specifications.

The rig that is currently causing the serious damage is not properly equipped with the antileak safety device that is required by Federal regulations. Further, the oil company involved was recently found to be operating approximately half of its rigs in this oil field without the required devices.

Granted, there is some scepticism concerning the effectiveness of the safety device. But such scepticism does not excuse disregard for regulations. A proper response to doubts about the effectiveness of the device would be a crash program—financed by the producing companies—to develop and install really effective safety mechanisms.

Finally, there is another form of waterborne pollution that should be mentioned here. This is the human waste that is dumped by vessels of all sorts.

There are approximately 46,000 federally registered commercial vessels, 65,000 unregistered commercial fishing vessels, 1,600 federally owned vessels, and 8 million recreational vessels using American waterways.

The human pollution potential from such watercraft is estimated to be equivalent to that of a city of over half a million population—a city the size of Cincinnati or San Diego.

Only a small percentage of these watercraft is equipped with sewage treatment facilities. Requirements should be toughened to eliminate this pollution potential.

Mr. President, we have already suffered from accidents on and around water. But we have not suffered a really big accident—not yet.

Nevertheless, we should not be content to accept the very real and painful damages inflicted by small- and medium-size accidents. And we should not rely on luck to protect us from the big accidents that are a permanent possibility in the modern world.

We are fortunate that we have become alert to these damages before being struck by the worst of them. Let us do everything in our power to take advantage of our early alertness. Let us act now so that in the future we will rely less on luck. Let us make ships and shipping safer and cleaner.

Let us make all activities on and around water a blessing of, rather than a threat to, our beautiful coasts and inland waterways.

LEGISLATION TO RELIEVE WESTERN FREIGHT CAR SHORTAGES VITALLY NEEDED

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, on March 24, a special subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce dealing with freight car shortages began hearings under the chairmanship of the distinguished Senator from Indiana (Mr. HARTKE) on S. 3223, a bill to change the present time-mileage formula on boxcars held by a railroad company other than the owner of the freight car.

This legislation is vitally needed in the west where we face perpetual freight car shortages under the current rules. This continual freight car shortage has a serious and detrimental effect upon the commerce of the Western States.

Because of the great interest expressed in this legislation by people throughout my State of Idaho, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my testimony presented on the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the testimony was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR FRANK CHURCH

MR. CHAIRMAN: Each year, around harvest time, Idaho farmers and producers face a deplorable crisis. Because of ineffective ICC regulations, there simply are not enough railroad freight cars to serve Idaho and other Western states.

Under present law, a "time-mileage" system is used to charge railroads that use another company's boxcars instead of retaining them. This system has a two-fold effect upon Western railroads and producers. First, it is more profitable for Eastern and Southern railroads to hoard Western boxcars and pay the charge than to build their own. Thus many boxcars belonging to Western companies never reach their home. Secondly, Western railroads cannot afford to take advantage of the same system because, as a rule, they travel much greater distances to deliver their loads than their Eastern counterparts.

I believe, as do many concerned Idahoans who have written me, that S. 3223 would effectively end this perennial crisis. If passed, it would eliminate the inequitable mileage provision from the law. A system based purely on time would be established, and, hopefully, make it unprofitable for the Eastern and Southern railroads to keep Western freight cars, forcing them to return these cars to the West, where they are vitally needed and rightfully belong.

The severity of the boxcar shortage is not to be underestimated. In a letter, R. L. Henry, administrator of the Idaho Transportation Council, described the situation: ". . . at its height this shortage was so serious that a collapse of the normal distribution functions provided grain during harvest was threatened. Great economic loss has resulted to all segments of agriculture and forestry in the West." Furthermore, Mr. Henry noted that "car shortages which in the past were relatively short-lived appear to be growing in intensity and to be of longer and longer duration."

Another constituent, Lewis I. Phillips, manager of the Lewiston Grain Growers, Inc., wrote me and provided another insight to the problem: "Traditionally we pay our producers for grain in full at time of purchase. Money from sales of grain is not received until the car is shipped. Ninety per cent is advanced when loaded and final settlement when the grain is unloaded, weighed and graded—approximately a month to six weeks. We handle from 175,000 to 200,000 tons of grain and peas per year. Many times during the marketing season we are from 100 to 200 cars behind in shipments. This is very costly to us, especially since the cost of money is so high."

Idahoans are rightfully concerned over the freight car shortage. I have received many letters from worried constituents urging passage of S. 3223. None of the mail has been unfavorable.

As a co-sponsor of S. 3223, I urge quick action. Passage of this bill will end the costly discrimination that farmers and producers in Idaho and other Western States now face each year.

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, March 25 marks another reminder of the hardships and deprivation faced by millions of oppressed people across the world. On this day, Byelorussian descendants will celebrate the 52d anniversary of the Declaration of Byelorussian Independence, a brief moment of freedom in that nation's history.

Prior to World War I, great steps were made among several European nations in establishing a firm foundation for democracy. Through an organizational congress, those nations hoped to protect themselves from outside aggression.

The Byelorussian State, withstanding military pressure from Russian forces, was secretly preparing for the opportune moment to break from their oppression. Such a moment presented itself when the Russians became involved in the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917; and February 19, 1918, with the support of the military, the Byelorussian Congress gained total control of their government. On March 25, 1918, the congress declared its nation an independent and free state.

However, in late 1918, the Russian armies again invaded the Byelorussian territory. On December 10, a Soviet government was reestablished, destroying the self-governing Byelorussian Congress.

Although their independence was short-lived, the citzens of this nation demonstrated to the world their determined capability in self-government. With improved education, immediate advancements were made in literature and the arts. Great emphasis was placed on social reforms, and citizen participation in the democratic procedures was immense.

Mr. President, as Americans join with Byelorussian descendants in acknowledging their Independence Day, we honor and pay tribute to the aspirations of all free men.

DR. JAMES EARL RUDDER

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I was saddened to learn of the passing of a great Texan and distinguished educator, Dr. James Earl Rudder. Dr. Rudder was the president of the Texas A. and M. University and system. He was born in 1910 in Eden, Tex. His career of public service began in 1933 when he was a teacher and football coach at Brady High School in Brady, Tex. From 1938 to 1941 he taught at Tarleton Agricultural College, at Stephenville, Tex.

In 1941, Earl Rudder heeded his country's call. He served with great distinction in the U.S. Army and rose from first lieutenant to colonel in 5 years. He emerged from the service richly decorated, having received the Distinguished Service Cross, the Silver Star Medal, the Legion of Merit, the Bronze Star Medal with oak leaf cluster, and other awards for valor and service.

When he returned to Texas after the war, he became mayor of Brady and served in that office until 1952. He subsequently became commissioner of the general land office of Texas, chairman of the veterans' land board, and in 1958, vice president of Texas A. and M. University. The following year, Dr. Rudder was made president of the university and served in that office until his death.

Mr. President, Texas A. and M. University has enjoyed more than a decade of growth and advancement in educational quality under the leadership of Dr. Rudder. He will be sorely missed.

NOMINATION OF GEORGE HARROLD CARSWELL TO THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I wish to add to the RECORD several additional telegrams which have come to my office expressing support for Judge Carswell. As I have said before, I dislike this numbers game, and I think endorsements of this sort add little real substance to our proceedings. But now that the game is in progress I cannot very well withdraw, lest by doing so, we create the erroneous impression that the naysayers have carried the field. For this reason, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD several telegrams from judges and lawyers from Florida and Indiana.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.,
March 23, 1970.

Senator EDWARD GURNEY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.:

I urge your vote for approval of Judge Carswell nomination to the United States Supreme Court.

ROBERT E. BEACH,
Circuit Judge, 6th Judicial Circuit, State of Florida.

LAKELAND, FLA.,
March 23, 1970.

Hon. EDWARD J. GURNEY,
New Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Having served in U.S. Attorneys Office, Southern District of Florida, when Judge Carswell was U.S. Attorney in Northern District, I know from liaison between us that Judge Carswell was astute, knowledgeable in the law, honest, fair to all and conscientious. It is inconceivable that more could be expected of a nominee to any judgeship in the land. Particularly to that on U.S. Supreme Court. Urge prompt vote and confirmation of Judge Carswell's nomination.

JOSEPH P. MCNULTY,
Judge, Court of Appeal, Second District of Florida.

MIAMI, FLA.,
March 23, 1970.

Hon. EDWARD J. GURNEY,
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

DEAR SENATOR: I believe Judge G. Harrold Carswell is well qualified by reason of his judicial background, experience and temperament to serve as Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States I respectfully urge his appointment.

JAMES LAWRENCE KING,
Circuit Judge, Dade County Courthouse.

PETERSBURG, IND.,
March 23, 1970.

Senator EDWARD GURNEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

I recommend the immediate confirmation of Judge Carswell as a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. The overwhelming evidence establishes his qualifications. Only a red herring is being dragged across the trail. For purposes of identification only I am a former president of the Indiana Bar Association, former chairman of the house of delegates, former chairman of the Trial Lawyers Section and have been practicing law for almost 50 years.

CARL M. GRAY.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.,
March 24, 1970.

Hon. EDWARD J. GURNEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Am happy to add my endorsement of Judge Carswell and urge his affirmation.

FLOYD W. BURNS,
Past President, Indiana State Bar Association.

COLUMBUS, IND.,
March 24, 1970.

Senator EDWARD GURNEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

As a past president of the Indiana State Bar Association, I find among members of the legal profession in Indiana, strong support for the appointment of Judge Carswell to the U.S. Supreme Court. I recommend that Judge Carswell's appointment to the U.S. Supreme Court be confirmed without delay for the good of the country.

THOMAS C. BIGLEY,
Charpnack, Biley & Jurgemeyer.

ORLANDO, FLA.,
March 24, 1970.

Hon. EDWARD J. GURNEY, Jr.
U.S. Senator,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

Strongly urge active support Judge Carswell. I have known Judge Carswell for many years as a man, lawyer, and judge and am familiar with his service as United States Attorney and United States District Judge both from the viewpoint of an interested citizen, practicing attorney and one active in the affairs of the bar. Judge Carswell in my opinion is most eminently qualified to be a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States by virtue of his legal ability, humaneness, and judicial temperament.

O. B. MCEWAN,
President Florida Bar 1958–1959.

MARION, IND.,
March 25, 1970.

Hon. EDWARD J. GURNEY,
Senate of the United States,
Washington, D.C.:

I believe the substantial majority of Indiana attorneys regret the controversy over Judge Carswell's confirmation and fear the effect it might have on the prestige of both the Senate and the Supreme Court. This personal opinion is based on my experience as past president and incumbent House of Delegates chairman, Indiana State Bar Association. I consider Judge Carswell eminently qualified in all respects.

ROBERT A. GEMMILL.

ANNIVERSARY OF GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, 149 years ago, Greek loyalists started the groundwork for a revolution that eventually led to an independent state.

Under the leadership of Alexandros Ypsilantis, the first of a series of revolts against the Turks started on March 25, 1821, the accepted birthdate of Greek Independence. The Turkish empire did not accept the government of the Greeks and the subsequent fighting is comparable to that of the American colonists after our own Declaration of Independence. As in our case, it was several years and many battles before the final official acceptance of Greece as a free and independent nation occurred on October 20, 1827.

The Greeks were convinced this would be a permanent freedom, and they received protection from three world powers, Great Britain, France, and Russia. Because their earlier intervention aided in the Greek revolution, those powers collectively selected a ruler for Greece. However, a nationalistic overthrow in 1843 provided Greece with not only a democratic-oriented national assembly, but also a constitution based on democratic principles.

However, from that year until the present, Greece has been continually confronted with change in government control. But despite the turmoil, the Greek loyalists have shown to the world their enthusiastic determination to remain free.

Mr. President, in acknowledging March 25 as a day Americans should pay tribute to Greek descendants in their fight to remain a free nation, we should remember their deep influence on our way of life. Our democratic principles and beliefs are derived directly from ancient Greece. Much of our culture, including literature, the arts, and athletics, has been derived from noted Greeks. And the contributions of Greek-Americans to this Nation's way of life have been singularly notable.

Therefore, let all Americans, this day, extend to Greece and her people, our hope for lasting peace and freedom.

REPRESENTATIVE BROOMFIELD PRESENTS POLICY FOR THE MIDDLE EAST STATEMENT

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I invite the attention of Congress to a timely and compelling address on United States-Israeli relations by a distinguished member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD, of Michigan.

Representative BROOMFIELD's remarks merit study and consideration. Indeed, I would say that his address is among the best summaries of the current situation available to Congress and the people.

I ask unanimous consent that the speech be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: We know why we are here. This is a time for action, not rhetoric. As devoted Zionists, you are committed to Israeli-American friendship and the preservation of freedom not only in our own country but also in the State of Israel.

You know the facts of the very serious and very grim crisis confronting Israel. You have carefully followed every development—heartwarming developments and heart-rending developments. You are not misled by double-talk and high-sounding formulations. You want to know the score in Israeli-American relations.

The situation is too tense for sugar-coating. There are very real fears that Israel's support in Washington has eroded. There is concern that the Jewish State is being cut off, isolated, rejected, and betrayed.

Your invitation to address the Zionists of Detroit came at a timely moment. It came at a moment when my own concern was increasing.

As a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, I am the ranking Republican on the Far East and Pacific Affairs Subcommittee. I have observed the brutality of Communist aggression. I have followed the phony peace talks and feel that we should not be seduced by Communist tactics.

Just as world communism works through stooges and agents in Southeast Asia, Moscow is today operating through the radical Arab States to penetrate the Middle East and Mediterranean. Israel is the target because Israel is an outpost of freedom. A defeat for Israel would be a very terrible defeat for the United States of America. It would undermine the American position and that of all free nations in the Mediterranean, Africa, and Western Europe as well as the Middle East. The implications are far more serious than some situations in Southeast Asia when viewed from the overall national security interests of the United States.

If we were justified in committing thousands of American lives in Southeast Asia and draining our economy to halt aggression there, the least we can do is to support Israel in the arena of diplomacy. The least we can do, under the Nixon doctrine, is to provide arms for a nation fighting for its survival against Communist-supported aggressors.

No American troops are sought by Israel. But we nevertheless must deter direct Soviet military intervention. President Nixon told Congress last month that "the United States would view any effort by the Soviet Union to seek predominance in the Middle East as a matter of grave concern."

The President was referring to Israel when he said that "the time has passed in which powerful nations can or should dictate the future to less powerful nations. The policy of this administration is to help strengthen the freedom of other nations to determine their own futures. Any effort by an outside power to exploit local conflict for its own advantage or to seek a special position of its own would be contrary to that goal."

In accordance with this aim, the President reaffirmed our stated intention to maintain careful watch on the balance of military forces and to provide arms to Israel as the need arises.

JETS NEEDED NOW

My own assessment on the situation is that the need already exists. Further delay is dangerous.

France has joined the Soviet Union in supplying sophisticated arms to the radical Arab states. Israel can look only to Washington for continuity of supply of sophisticated military aircraft. If Washington does not act, the danger of aggression will grow; the strength of the Arabs will increase while Israeli deterrent power deteriorates; violations of the cease-fire will escalate, and the Soviet Union might miscalculate and wrongly assess American intentions in a grave error that could bring about a terrible nuclear confrontation threatening the entire world.

It is no longer a question of whether we can afford to provide Israel with the necessary jets and even to extend new lines of credit to cover financing. It is now a matter of whether we can afford not to take action on Israel's urgent needs. This is the way to avoid confrontation. This is the way to peace through strength. And this is the way to redeem our moral and ethical commitments to the people of Israel.

Coinciding with my appearance here tonight, I have sent the following telegram to President Nixon:

"Urgently recommend immediate authorization of sale of additional military jet aircraft to Israel. In my judgment, a favorable decision necessary in response to new French arms policy favoring Arabs which compounds continuing Soviet involvement on Arab side. Favorable action would redeem our commitment, promote regional stability, deter aggression, serve cause of peace, and bolster the national security interests of the United States."

I did not concur in any American role at the United Nations or in concept with the Soviet Union, France, or Britain to impose a peace at Israel's expense during the previous administration.

BIG FOUR FAILURE

I do not accept such a dubious diplomatic approach under the present administration in view of the record of the Big Four talks. That record adds up to a great big nothing in terms of actual results. But the Russians and their Arab friends have extracted great propaganda value and attempted to drive a wedge between the United States and Israel.

The United States remains convinced that peace can be based only on the voluntary agreement of the parties directly involved. The only peace worthy of the name must be based upon direct, face-to-face negotiations that produce a genuine settlement. Nothing less will suffice. The President has said that "there is no substitute for negotiations. Peace and security can only emerge from the mutual agreement of the two sides immediately concerned."

That is the position. It must remain our position. You are a very sophisticated group and realize that the art of diplomacy is complex.

Words and stories that appear in the press are often confusing and misleading. I looked into the diplomatic situation just before leaving Washington and have reassured myself that this Administration, alone or in concert with any other power, will not dictate the terms of peace or seek to impose a settlement.

President Nixon stated on September 8, 1968, that "it is not realistic to expect Israel to surrender vital bargaining counters in the absence of genuine and effective guarantees." This Administration continues to recognize that fact.

REAL PEACE VITAL

As a Member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I would go one step further. I would strongly urge upon the Government of Israel that the Israelis refuse to withdraw from even a single inch of occupied territory unless the Arabs sign a real peace treaty. That is the only way to translate the continuing bloodshed into an acceptable basis for national and human existence.

The Soviet Union or Egypt or anyone else would be badly misguided to conclude that the United States is going to high-pressure Israel into unilateral withdrawal.

There are some who advocate a spirit of compromise on the issue of Israel, a policy of "give and take." We must make sure that the United States does not "give" at the expense of Israel while the Soviet Union "takes" for the Arabs.

It was in the historic days following the Six Day War that I visited Israel. I was deeply moved by the brave and modest young men of Israel who faced the terrible Russian firepower provided to the Arabs. In recent months, I have received many telegrams from constituents concerned that Israel would be sold out. My memory of what I saw and felt in Israel remains so compelling that the telegrams renew my determination to keep the faith with the Israeli soldiers whose hands I grasped in admiration and friendship.

Some facts must be brought home to Washington. Not everyone understands how Israel feels. Israel is surrounded, besieged, subjected to vilification and hatred, to guerrilla attacks and sabotage.

The Israelis may point out that while the United States is the advocate of peace, the Soviet Union is the advocate only of the Arabs. The Israelis may also raise a very relevant question: Would a rollback from occupied territory and one-sided concessions actually satisfy the extremists of the so-called National Liberation Front of the Arabs?

It is perfectly understandable that Israel would scrutinize everything our Government says and does. Israel's survival is at stake.

The Israelis remember very well the Nazi genocide which was perpetrated while the civilized world stood by and phrased platitudes. The Israelis remember the liquidation of Jews in the Warsaw ghetto. They remember Munich and all that followed.

They saw what happened to Czechoslovakia only two years ago. Israel is determined not to become another Czechoslovakia!

Israelis are well aware of the anti-Jewish persecution now practiced in various Arab states. They watch with dread foreboding as the Soviet Union impugns the loyalty of its Jewish citizens.

I read with horror in the Detroit Jewish News of the insidious pressure with which Russia is forcing prominent Soviet Jews to condemn Israel and Zionism. I read of the courage of those brave Jews in Russia who expressed indignation.

SOVIET ANTI-SEMITISM

If the Soviet Union sends those courageous people to Siberia for speaking their minds, Russian pretensions will stand exposed anew in the eyes of all Americans, Jewish and non-Jewish.

These new demonstrations of Communist hatred for Israel and the Jewish people may lead to show trials of those who spoke out against discrimination or applied for visas to settle in Israel. Jews may be made scapegoats in pursuit of domestic conformity in the monolithic Soviet state and to advance Russian aspirations in the Arab world.

I wish to note in this connection that President Nixon has urged Senate ratification of the Genocide Treaty. The President is trying to get Senator Fulbright, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to take action—after so many years of delay—to act on the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. American ratification would strengthen the hand of the President in speaking out against Soviet anti-semitism. I am proud to see a Republican Administration take this initiative.

REPUBLICANS BACK ISRAEL

Let me say quite frankly that all the friends of Israel are not to be found clustered together in one particular political party.

Take a look at the absence of certain names—and the presence of others—on the most recent Congressional declaration in support of Israel.

I do not say this in a partisan spirit but in a sense of pride that my party, as represented in Congress, now has a leadership that affords us great leverage on crucial issues when dealing with the State Department and other agencies of the Executive Department.

On the other hand, some key personalities in the leadership of the majority party, especially in the Senate, have given aid and comfort to the makers of dubious Middle Eastern policies.

The new Congressional declaration to which I refer was introduced by my distinguished colleague, Manny Celler of New York, the beloved dean of the House.

It stipulates that "It is not in the interest of the United States or in the service of world peace to create the impression that Israel will be left defenseless in face of the continuing flow of sophisticated offensive armaments to the Arab nations supplied by the Soviet Union and other sources."

This reflects my own thinking to the extent that I not only signed the declaration but called it to the attention of colleagues in my own party from Michigan.

Recent events have caused great concern. The fighting has escalated. The young and brave are giving their lives so that Israel may live.

Arab fanatics are trying to blockade Israel by bombing commercial airliners. They seek to strangle the airline routes linking Israel with the free world. Airports and passengers have been attacked.

This outbreak of extremism against Israel is quietly encouraged by those who send new supplies of the latest arms to extremist Arab states that give aid and comfort to the terrorists.

FRANCE UPSETS BALANCE

A new factor was introduced by the massive French arms transaction with Libya. I cannot imagine why Libya, with an army smaller than the Detroit police department, needs 110 of the latest Mirage jet fighter-bombers—or hundreds of powerful tanks.

Much has been said about the recent visit of President Pompidou of France.

When President Pompidou was an official guest in Washington, I gave him the respect but scrutinized his actions.

Upon returning to Paris from our hospitality, President Pompidou announced a credit of $810 million to the Soviet Union to finance Russian purchases of French machinery and equipment over the next five years. Some of the machinery and equipment would facilitate Soviet munitions manufacture. The French Communist Party has welcomed this action by the Pompidou Administration, just as it supports his policy toward Israel and Zionism.

When our Committee on Foreign Affairs takes up matters pertaining to France, I intend to raise a question about Pompidou's new transaction favoring the Russians, coming as it does on top of the irresponsible transaction with Libya.

I can assure you that President Nixon may be persuaded by the requirements for diplomatic protocol in receiving foreign guests, but he is not necessarily won over to their policies.

POMPIDOU JEOPARDIZES PEACE

I have very deep reservations about French policies and categorically reject the contention that massive build-up of leftist extremists in Libya serves the cause of peace in the Middle East. I think that Pompidou has done the world a disservice by cancelling contracts made in presumably good faith to provide jets to Israel and then turning around and giving such jets and additional ones to Israel's mortal enemies.

This is two-faced policy and I deplore it.

There have been reports that France may even sell Mirage jets to Communist China. We are looking into this.

There is also a new question involving possible shipment of French jets to Pakistan. But that is not yet confirmed.

I am shocked to learn that Pakistan, a major beneficiary of the U.S. foreign aid program, has sent troops to Jordan to assist in the unrelenting war against Israel.

It is my understanding Pakistani troops, equipped with anti-aircraft weapons, are being deployed in Jordan to shoot down the jets provided to Israel by the United States.

Over 1,000 Pakistani soldiers have already arrived in Jordan and are taking combat positions near the cease-fire lines. I feel that this intrusion by Pakistan into the friction embroiling Israel and her immediate neighbors adds a dangerous new element to the crisis.

The time has come from our Government to serve notice on Pakistan that her entrance into the Arab-Israeli hostilities will not be tolerated by the United States.

Another new situation is developing in Iraq. Following the announcement of a peace between the Iraqi government and dissident Kurdish elements and solution of the civil war in Iraq, announcement was made that more Iraqi troops will be sent to Jordan to fight Israel.

This also adds a new element in that Iraq was a party to neither the 1949 armistice agreement nor the 1967 cease-fire. Thus, an active state of war between Iraq and Israel exists. The grim fact is that the Iraqis are the very worst offenders of human rights among the modern Arab states in terms of mass executions of Jewish citizens and others persecuted by the dictatorial regime.

The situation on the Middle Eastern horizon is compounded by threat after threat. But Israel is not without friends. I want to tell you that I have been reassured on the highest levels in Washington that the United States Government stands by its friends. Israel is one of its friends.

The action on the supply of additional jets to Israel is behind the timetable that I would prefer. But I am fully confident that this step will be taken. Indeed, deliveries of Phantoms and other weapons are proceeding week by week and month by month under previous authorizations and existing contracts.

The friendship of our two countries is an article of faith. President Nixon has very recently reaffirmed American-Israeli friendship.

Mrs. Golda Meir, Prime Minister of Israel, stated that she "noted with gratification" the clear expression by President Nixon on the the issue of Israel's security and integrity.

I refer to the message sent to the emergency conference of Jewish leaders in Washington on January 25 through my good friend, Max Fisher.

It would be unfair to judge the President and condemn him merely because he found it necessary to apologize to President Pompidou—nor because of the delay in approval of the latest jet transactions. I feel that the total record of this Administration should be judged in perspective when all facts are in. But, I do not identify with every twist and turn of State Department and White House policies. I support what seems right and oppose what seems wrong.

The Zionist movement is inherently valuable. It serves as a prod to conscience; a guideline amidst confusing and contradictory voices from many sources. Zionism makes for better Americanism.

Despite all that I can say, there remains a residue of fear about U.S. policies. A new declaration on Middle East policy is essential. But it must do more than voice phrases. Actions must occur. Our friends must be reassured. Our enemies must not miscalculate.

ACTIONS URGED

I wish tonight to propose a 6-point action program, inspired by the Star of David, symbolic of Jewish national survival. I urge the Government to take the following actions to meet the crisis:

1. Announce without further delay the provision of additional Phantom and Skyhawk jets and other weapons required by Israel with appropriate financing arrangements.

2. Establish a telephone "hot line" between Washington and Jerusalem, a proposal first advanced by the Republican leadership of Congress. This would enable Mrs. Meir to clarify any misunderstanding directly with the President or vice versa. It would be useful if new factors were introduced into the conflict by an outside power.

In an emergency, the President could act instantaneously. The existence of the hot line would reassure Israel and deter those who would drive a wedge between Israel and the United States.

3. Withdraw from the Big Four talks to dramatize our rejection of the Soviet and French manipulation of such talks. The Franco-Soviet position would enable the Arabs to accomplish through diplomatic pressures what they failed to achieve on the field of battle. Moscow has shown contempt for American good faith. There is no real benefit in continuing in a forum for anti-Israel propaganda.

4. Re-affirm the principle of a just settlement involving direct face-to-face negotiations in which the Arabs acknowledge their responsibility for real peace and sign such a treaty. Proclaim that Israel must not withdraw from a single inch of occupied territory until a genuine peace is achieved covering all forms of aggression including guerrilla warfare.

5. Convene an international conference of all nations serving the Middle East through commercial airlines to take strong steps to stop terrorism. These measures should include a boycott of the airports and aircraft of any nation that gives aid and comfort to terrorists. Seek international embargo on sale of all aircraft, civilian and military, to any country that collaborates with Arab terrorism like that in the Swiss Air tragedy.

6. Serve notice upon the Soviet Union at the highest diplomatic levels that the United States Government looks with concern at new indications of anti-semitism within the Soviet Union just as we deplore racism and persecution throughout the world. Take new initiatives at the United Nations in conformity with international undertakings on human rights and accompanied by United States Senate ratification of the convention on Genocide.

We have no warlike motives in the Middle East. The American people desire only the friendship of all the various nations of that region. It is our fervent prayer that nations accord others the right to exist.

Perhaps realization will come that true liberation can be found in development of one's own country, raising of one's own living standard, and the development of one's own social justice. Aggression will not succeed, no matter the grandiose phrases invoked to justify the unrelenting warfare by regular and guerrilla forces.

All parties are obviously better served by peace negotiations and the acceptance of the facts of life. The real interests of both Arab and Israelis require peaceful coexistence.

In that land where the Prophets dreamed that nation should not lift up sword against nation, let there be peace.

For Israel, a nation of people whose suffering merits a life more creative than perpetual service in an armed camp, let there be peace. For the Arabs, whose poverty and frustration require schools and hospitals and a decent life rather than the endless purchase of jets and guns, let there be peace.

Israel could be a light unto the nations of that region if the Arabs would accept fellow human beings of the Jewish faith as entitled to nationhood as any other people. The genius and productivity of the Israelis could help others make their deserts blossom.

Instead of the cradle of civilization becoming its grave, let the cradle of civilization give rise to two peoples, Arab and Jewish, each in their own countries, with commerce and travel flowing across peaceful borders, and with a new sense of mutual respect in keeping with our dream of the brotherhood of man under the fatherhood of God.

I want to add a special and very personal word to this audience. Many of you have devoted your lives to the Zionist cause. You have seen in Zionism a redemption of freedom and human dignity, the rebirth of a nation, and the rebirth of a people. But we are now witnessing painful days, tragic days, in which the powers and political trends and pressures of the world appear to be converging on the Middle East.

Israel was reborn in blood and fire. Israel is today struggling in an ordeal of blood and fire. But this time it is different. The State of Israel has proved its mettle. Israel is a nation among the nations.

You can take pride, as dedicated supporters of Israel, as Zionists, in the nation you have helped build. But the watchman of Israel does not sleep.

Trying days lie ahead. Yet, in your heart of hearts, you can draw faith and sustenance and reassurance from one fact: This is the United States of America. This is our country and we, Jews and non-Jews, peoples of all parts of this country, the silent Americans and the articulate Americans, will not let Israel down.

I thank you.

JUDICIAL REFORM—STATEMENT OF HON. J. DUDLEY DIGGES, ASSOCIATE JUDGE, MARYLAND COURT OF APPEALS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, throughout the country our civil and criminal courts continue to be plagued with congestion and delay as a result of the use of archaic, inefficient judicial machinery. Last week, the Subcommittee on Improvements in Judicial Machinery, of which I am chairman, held a hearing on this crucial problem. Special attention was focused upon S. 3289, the National Court Assistance Act, a bill that would provide Federal assistance to State and local courts to help modernize and improve their judicial operations.

My subcommittee was privileged to receive at this hearing the testimony of the Honorable J. Dudley Digges, associate judge of the Court of Appeals of Maryland and formerly chief judge of the Seventh Judicial Circuit of Maryland. Judge Digges is not only a most learned and sensitive judge but also one of the finest judicial administrators in the country. When he speaks on the subject of judicial reform, it behooves all concerned with the problem to listen keenly. At the subcommittee hearing, Judge Digges delivered an outstanding statement which could serve as a fine lesson in judicial administration for every court in the country. I ask unanimous consent that Judge Digges' statement be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF J. DUDLEY DIGGES

Mr. Chairman, in response to your request for comments on your proposed bill (S. 3289) establishing a National Institute for Judicial Studies and Assistance, I would like to make two observations, and those are that—

(1) Where modern business and analytical techniques have been applied to the crisis in our courts, they have resulted in dramatic improvements, and

(2) At the present time the states are neither financially equipped nor motivated to initiate a long range, persistent and sustained drive to clear up the congestion in our courts. I am of the opinion therefore that the educational and advisory functions of the Institute that you are attempting to establish can supply both the impetus and the back up needed to educate judges, lawyers and state officials to the needs and the possible solutions for the problems of the administration of civil and criminal justice in this country.

Addressing myself to the first observation, I can only speak from a very parochial viewpoint. As early as 1960, before I was Chief Judge of Maryland's Seventh Judicial Circuit, composed of the trial courts of a suburban county bordering on Washington, D.C., and three rural counties, my colleagues on the Bench and I initiated administrative reform techniques along the lines you plan for the Judicial Institute. I note now, with some relief, that we began to apply these modern business techniques before and not after the explosion of cases began, having anticipated an immense population shift into our judicial bailiwick. Our population shifted from 357,395 to 768,900 and our yearly number of cases filed in our circuit court alone rose from 4,749 to 8,751 annually. (See appendix A and B) The successful results of our anticipation is significant and, I believe, strong reason for waiting no longer to establish your institute, for the problems raised by an increased docket must be made manageable before they get completely out of hand, as they already have in many urban areas.

Our experiences in the Seventh Circuit have been most gratifying to us, for by identifying our problems early, and discarding old unworkable solutions to them, we checked what many believed to be the inexorable fate of all urban court systems, the drift into court congestion.

For example, we realized initially that under the ever increasing press of cases that we could no longer depend on the good will of competing lawyers to insure a smooth running docket. Instead we placed this responsibility in an efficiently run assignment office, which ran its calendars independently of the elaborate and slow moving filing system of our Clerk's office. A lawyer would be given reasonable notice as to the next available trial date and a reasonable opportunity to object, but absent an objection we also assured him that his case would in fact be heard on that day. This last assurance fell on the judges, for in order not to disrupt a following day's trial calendar we made it our policy to finish a case on its scheduled day, even if this meant leaving after 4:30. The system worked. Interpolating our ideal requirements into actual figures, we now give 4–6 months notice of a trial date with 30 days to object and reschedule. As for the assurance of trial on that date I believe it is instructive to note that since we have instituted this system there have only been eleven known instances of litigants not getting into court on the day assigned.

In another problematic area, when we saw the first signs of massive filing congestion we enacted local rules of court which gave our judges authority to dismiss or place on an inactive docket half-dormant cases. We found that this was not enough, and we changed our rules so they would be self-executing, that is, when a case reached certain points in time, 6 months, 12 months, 18 months, without appropriate action, the Clerk would automatically place them on our inactive dockets, and if a case presented special problems we would assign it to an individual judge for his special attention. For the general inactive case, however, we shifted the administrative burden from the judges to the clerks and then to the individual attorney to get his case back in an active status. To our surprise over 75% of the cases so disposed of were never brought to life again and were eventually dismissed. But even this was not enough, for all we had been doing was shifting the burden of responsibility among individuals, judges, clerks, or attorneys, who were already overburdened by other demands of the system. Finally, in 1967 we succeeded in creating the post of court administrator for our entire Circuit, and filled it not with a broken down lawyer but with a bright young businessman who, fortunately for us, had extensive experience with the administration of justice as a probation officer. The task of sifting out deadwood and placing attorneys on their toes ultimately devolved upon him as coordinator of other courthouse offices responsible for this task.

As with our assignment system, we routed our old inactive cases out of the labyrinth of the court house filing system and placed them in an independent system amenable to efficient analysis, which we have set up in such a way that can be converted into a computerized data processing system. While we employed a programmer for this very purpose only last November, even on a manual system we came to grips with a potential backlog of cases by changing our entire approach to the problem. Moreover, by channeling this administrative burden into an office where an adequate number of efficient man hours could be applied on a full time basis we freed clerks, judges and attorneys for chores for which they were better motivated and equipped. We have found ourselves in the enviable position in this state, and perhaps in the nation, of terminating annually more cases than are filed. Last year in Prince George's County we closed 9,238 cases while only 8,851 were begun. (See Appendix B) We attribute this to the application of modern business techniques.

I do not mean to imply that we were simply juggling statistics, or that most courts only have 25% as many active cases as most judicial statistics would seem to indicate. What I am trying to stress is that by loosening up what was basically a filing logjam, we found more judicial, clerical, and attorney work time to give the active litigant his full day in court much sooner than could ever be anticipated. Except in cases requiring a mental examination for an insanity defense, we now hear a great majority of our criminal trials within much less than three months after arrest. Our active civil cases, still in the mainstream of the system, are disposed of within less than six months from the date an answer is filed—as the rule and not the exception. Now we have no criminal cases over 9 months old, and by singling out our 100 "most wanted cases" in the various divisions of our case load, we can proudly report that as of yesterday at 10 A.M. there are less than 336 civil cases in Prince George's County that have been pending for more than 18 months, and we are trimming that list down continually.

In other areas of civil and criminal judicial administration we have speeded up processes of preliminary dispositions as much as ten times. A good example of this is in the juvenile field, an area where the problem of delay between arrest and disposition is being critically felt all over our nation. It once took us over eight weeks to get from arrest to a preliminary disposition in even the simplest of cases. We appointed Juvenile Masters to cope with the flood, but that only seemed to be followed by an even greater flood of cases, in a rather grim application of Parkinson's law of increased work for increased personnel. With the assistance of our court administrator, we sat back and analyzed the problem. The answer was simple and still astounds us: By allowing our master to sit for initial arraignment and preliminary disposition on weeknights we found we can get a young offender into court with his parents within 48 hours after arrest. If the case gets beyond that point a final disposition can be set within three weeks. Thus, instead of treating all juvenile cases on the same footing requiring quadruplicate filing and processing by four different court agencies before any court action whatsoever, we now sift out those cases in advance that do not require the attention of so many judicial hands. We have completely eliminated our juvenile backlog, freed numerous services for those cases that deserve it, and most importantly, we have brought our young offenders into court for the immediate application of swift and attentive justice, all, I might add, with the full panoply of rights that were later set forth in the Galt decision.

This brings me to my second point, that as a rule most state and local judicial systems cannot sit back and evaluate their problems as we have been fortunate enough to do. Perhaps it's a lack of state funds or state motivation. I am not sure. But I suspect, just from my own attempts in Maryland, while on our State Rules and Procedures Committee, to have our approaches adopted on a statewide basis, that all of us involved in the administration of justice are simply too overwhelmed by our day to day problems and our fear of change to apply the initial impetus or long range persistence to adequately cope with these problems. It is here that I believe that the help of a National Institute for Judicial Studies and Assistance would be most invaluable. As we found that we could not keep passing the buck of reform to already overburdened components of our system and had to create a full time office devoted to efficient organization techniques, so too should the national government help create a full time office of study, analysis and education that could give each court in this country the benefit of fresh ideas in judicial administration. This can be an office that will not just pop up when congestion becomes intolerable and attempt to push the cap of the iceberg below the water line for a year or two, and then throw up its hands in despair when the inevitable re-emerges. The Institute for Judicial Studies and Assistance as you have conceived it, Mr. Chairman, will be able to supply the impetus and, most importantly, the long range persistence and study needed to cope with long range problems. Its educational function can alert our state government to the problems and new solutions to court congestion and help them work out answers suited to their individual long range needs. I heartily endorse its establishment.

EFFORTS TO FIND A CURE FOR CANCER

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am pleased to have the opportunity to cosponsor the resolution offered by the distinguished senior Senator from Texas (Mr. YARBOROUGH) authorizing the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to examine our efforts to find a cure for cancer. As Senator YARBOROUGH has indicated, the 300,000 American deaths last year from cancer dictate that conquest of cancer become a "highly visible national goal."

This Nation, with its vast resources, cannot continue to give a low priority to the health of its citizens. Statistics reveal that the richest Nation in the world has been doing so. The United States ranks 12th among industrial countries in the percentage of mothers who die in childbirth; 14th in infant mortality; and 18th in life expectancy of its males and 11th for its females. The fact that we have failed to commit sufficient funds for cancer, heart, and stroke research is equally disturbing.

We cannot be content to spend on the average of only $4 per year for each cancer victim in our efforts to find cures for cancer. It is almost unbelievable that a country that is spending approximately $2½ billion a month in Vietnam, has only been spending $200 million a year for cancer research.

I think that it would be most helpful in increasing our commitment to finding a cure for cancer, if, as this resolution requires, an Advisory Committee of Consultants on the Conquests of Cancer is appointed and reports to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

ECONOMICS OF AGING IN NEWARK, N.J.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging has received many stirring and informative statements during the past year for its study of "Economics of Aging: Toward a Full Share in Abundance."

Many of those presentations have been made at formal hearings or at information sessions conducted on Saturday mornings. On every such occasion, we have received heartfelt testimony about a national retirement income crisis and its effects upon individual older Americans.

One of the finest statements on the subject was received recently in Newark, N.J., during a discussion arranged by the National Council on the Aging. The speaker was the Reverend Kelmo Porter, executive director, Newark Council of Senior Citizens. Occasionally angry even while expressing compassion and concern, Reverend Porter spoke of elderly individuals who try to live on $600 a year, of others who must withdraw from medicare because they cannot pay the increased premium costs, and of others who—despite great progress made in providing public housing—cannot find shelter at rents they can afford.

Fortunately, the Reverend Mr. Porter and the Newark Commission are attempting to direct help to those who need it so much. Another source of help would be the kind of social security reforms offered in Senate bill 3100. This bill would raise minimum benefits, establish a cost-of-living adjustment mechanism, and provide more adequate payments to widows. In addition, it would eliminate the monthly premiums under part B of medicare.

Mr. President, the Reverend Mr. Porter's statement is a powerful commentary which—as he said—is equally applicable to other urban centers. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

In addition, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a prayer read as a benediction at the closing of the proceedings by William Fitch, Executive Director of the National Council on the Aging. The prayer was originally read as an invocation at the White House Conference on Nutrition, but I believe that it offers a message which should be worthy of careful consideration by the Congress of the United States.

There being no objection, the items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY THE REVEREND KELMO PORTER

I deem it a great personal honor and privilege to have this wonderful opportunity to tell you a little bit about our Commission, its eight multi-purpose senior centers located in the hard core poverty areas of our city, and something about the many, many economic problems encountered by our elderly citizens on a day to day basis.

For your information, our Golden Age Project, set up by the City of Newark under the Newark Senior Citizens Commission and funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity through our CAP Agency the United Community Corporation, was originally designed to create senior centers in the socially and economically deprived areas of the city of Newark, where thousands upon thousands of elderly citizens lived in conditions of poverty, isolation, public dependency, cultural deprivation, poor health and the lack of knowledge concerning a great variety of available community resources. Many of our seniors were entitled to Social Security, Medicare and free health services who were not even aware of this fact. Our senior centers provide for the recreational housing, health, social services, employment and educational needs of thousands of elderly citizens, with the purpose of establishing a formula to alleviate poverty and loneliness and to re-stimulate renewed interest in community living.

It can be clearly stated that of all the citizenry of our city, our state and nation, our elderly are the hardest hit by the ravages of poverty. Their limited incomes are, for the most part, fixed, and fiscally they have a most difficult time trying to make ends meet. In more human terms this simply means that they are soon confronted with conditions which lead to a breakdown of personality; a frustration of the individual, which ultimately leads to a greater degree of public dependency, which they so vehemently detest, due to unemployment. It leads to a variety of health problems of ever increasing severity, and finally a tremendous slump into the bleak twilight years, usually devoid of all meaning and/or hope.

I am perfectly sure that the City of Newark is no different than any of the other large hard core, depressed urban areas of our nation, with respect to the economic plight of the elderly; no different than New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Los Angeles or San Francisco; no different than Jersey City, Paterson, Trenton or Camden, N.J. The mounting economic problems of Newark's senior citizens are a gross travesty to our City, our State and our Nation.

In the City of Newark there are approximately 65,000 people 60 years of age or older. This represents about 15% of the total population of our city. One of every four families whose head is 65 years or older live in poverty. This rate of poverty is, by far, higher than for any other group residing in the city. In the city of Newark, among older persons living alone or with non-relatives, six out of every ten are poor. And because of their age they have little or no chance of making their way out of poverty through gainful employment. The high cost of living has spiraled far out of their reach; rising prices for food, clothing and medicine gradually consumes their purchasing power; their real income soon diminishes; their property taxes, for those fortunate enough to have a home, have become unbearable; and soon all of their limited assets are depleted. And I am sure my friends, that the story of Newark, N.J. with respect to the financial needs of our elderly, is the story of our state and our nation. All that the senior citizens of our city seem to ask is to be allowed to live their declining years with a measure of independence, self respect and dignity. They do not ask for hand-outs; they seek no charity; they do not want to sponge from or intrude upon relatives. But after thirty, forty and fifty years of sweat and honest toil; after founding and establishing the New Deal, braving the New Frontiers and perpetuating the Great Society, they want and deserve that which they firmly believe is rightly theirs.

But what a tragedy, especially when the seniors of our city are penalized simply for the crime of growing old? The great majority of senior citizens in the City of Newark receive Social Security benefits, with the average monthly social security check being under $100, and closer to $90.00. The clarion cry in our city is that the recent 15% social security increase was far too little and much too late. The rapid increases in taxes, rents and medicare; the rising cost of food, clothing and medicine, had already absorbed this pittance long before it was actually received. The elderly of Newark were among the first to rally and strongly lobby for a 40% to 50% social security increase. One woman recently told me that her total annual income was about $1,200. Her $50 monthly public housing rental left her about $50 a month or $600 a year to live on. She went on to say she often had a difficult time trying to decide whether she should buy food so she wouldn't starve, medicine so she could stay well, or some needed clothing so she could stay warm. This is but one of thousands of such cases in our city.

Many seniors have already indicated to me, our Executive Staff or our Center Directors that they have already, or that they soon intend to withdraw from Medicare. Their most common reason being that they simply aren't able financially to pay the monthly increase of from $4.00 to $5.30. Others tell stories of abuse from doctors who would rather receive cash other than the medicare process as prescribed by law.

The great lack of adequate housing for the elderly is another problem which confronts so many senior citizens in our city. And yet perhaps per capita our city has provided more elderly units than any other city its size in the nation. The City of Newark has a public housing population of nearly 50,000 people. There are more than 5,500 elderly units, housing almost 10,000 senior citizens; 2,500 of these units having been opened within the last two years. Another 500 units are currently on the Housing Authority's planning boards. And yet Housing's waiting lists indicates that another 3,000 to 4,000 units are necessary in our city. And as for a large number who reside outside of public housing, who live with relatives or perhaps own their own homes; our records indicate that they live in blighted homes, usually badly in need of expensive repairs, which they cannot afford, which are primarily located in the urban renewal or urban redevelopment areas of the city.

The rising cost of public transportation is another very serious economic problem within our city. Senior citizens, like all other travellers must pay from 25c to 45c per trip or from 50c to 90c round trip to ride to various points within the city. Many seniors, with their limited fixed income, simply can't afford to pay the price. Consequently they won't go to see their doctor, they won't seek the needed social services available to them, they simply won't go to visit a friend. Every effort is being made, however, to secure, in their behalf, reduced bus fares during the non-rush hours of the day.

Yes, there are so many other problem areas affecting the lives of the elderly in Newark; matters with which you perhaps are already familiar in your various communities. And yet our daily, weekly and monthly records indicates that hundreds and thousands of senior citizens who were heretofore living in unbelievable conditions of poverty, isolation, ill health, cultural deprivation and lack of knowledge concerning the available community resources, have now found wholesome community activities, medical attention, social services, adequate housing, employment, social and recreational activities, in spite of their economic situation.

In closing we, therefore, thank the Almighty God for the untiring efforts of dedicated men like our U.S. Senator Harrison Williams and his staff for his historic hearings in the interest of the State's and Nation's senior citizens, and for a good number of other great legislators like him, the nation over.

PROLOGUE: THE INVOCATION AT THE PEOPLE'S PLENARY SESSION

At the Opening of the December 3rd People's Plenary Session on the grounds of the White House Conference, the Reverend Joseph M. Clark, vicar of St. Christopher's Episcopal Church, Linthicum, Maryland, delivered the following invocation:

Almighty God, we who have been attending a conference at which we receive $18.30 a day for food, while our Government gives poor and needy children 15 cents for breakfast and 23 cents for lunch. We give thee no thanks.

We who place our priorities on the War, ABM's, S.S.T.'s and moon trips, while the poor of our nation go hungry, we give thee no thanks.

We who can live among the nation's 175,000,000 healthy Americans, while turning our backs on the 25,000,000 hungry, we give thee no thanks.

Oh Lord, we have failed Thee, we have failed our country, we have failed our communities and have failed ourselves. We ask thy forgiveness.

Oh Lord, give us the strength to fulfill our commitment to feed the hungry of our nation now.

All of this we ask in thy Son's Name, Amen.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS OF ASSISTANCE FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair lays before the Senate the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 514) to extend programs of assistance for elementary and secondary education, and for other purposes.

At this time, the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. ERVIN) is recognized for the purpose of concluding the speech on which he was interrupted yesterday.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief quorum call, without prejudicing the rights of the Senator from North Carolina under the order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. I also ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island and the distinguished Senator from Virginia for a colloquy relating to the conference report, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPONG. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his courtesy.

Mr. President, for the purpose of legislative history, I would like to ask the manager of the bill, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) several questions.

It is my understanding that present law authorizes advance or forward funding of all programs administered by the Commissioner of Education. Is that correct?

Mr. PELL. That is correct. It should also be noted that the Senate bill and the conference report reiterate congressional support for forward funding.

Mr. SPONG. I believe it is also correct that Congress has voted advance funding four times. In 1967 we voted to permit advance funding of all programs contained in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act. In 1968 we voted to permit advance funding of higher education programs. The same year, in the vocational education legislation, we voted to permit advance funding of all programs which the Commissioner of Education administers. This year, during initial consideration of this bill we again approved the concept of advance funding for all education programs.

Mr. PELL. The record will bear out those facts.

Mr. SPONG. Is it not true, however, that the advance funding procedure has been used only once—in fiscal 1969—and for only one program—title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act? Furthermore, I believe the only request for advance funding in this year's budget is for title I.

Mr. PELL. Unfortunately, this is also correct.

Mr. SPONG. On February 4, during initial Senate consideration of the bill, the Senate adopted my amendment to create a Commission to study ways of implementing the advance funding procedure. The amendment passed by voice vote after discussion of the possibility of combining the Commission provided by my amendment with the National Commission on School Finance provided by the committee bill.

Later, I voiced some concern about the possibility of combining the two studies. I feel that my study is of some urgency As written the two studies appear to deal with different aspects of funding: the National Commission seems to be concerned with where the money is coming from, while my Commission would be concerned with when the money is disbursed.

Another concern is that the National Commission on School Finance is appointed by the Commissioner of Education and no provision is made for congressional participation, although implementation of advance funding will require action by both the legislative and executive branches. I think it is obvious from past votes that Congress favors advance funding for education programs but there is no assurance whatsoever that the congressional view will be represented on that Commission.

That concern becomes secondary, however, in view of the fact that the conference bill contains neither my amendment nor any directions for the National Commission on School Finance to study advance or forward funding, although, I was pleased to note that you mentioned in your statement printed in yesterday's RECORD that the Commission on School Finance could study the question of advance funding. I certainly hope that this Commission will study advance funding and that it will do so expeditiously. There is an immediate need here. We simply cannot ask our schools, year after year, to go through Federal funding experiences such as they did this year.

Mr. PELL. I would support the Senator in that hope, for advance funding is not only a needed mechanism but one whose ramifications should be fully understood. Such a study would bring to the specific attention of the Congress the urgent necessity to act on this matter.

Mr. SPONG. I thank the Senator very much. I also thank the Senator from North Carolina for yielding to me.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from North Carolina yield to me, retaining his right to the floor, so that I may propose a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I am delighted to yield under those circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana is recognized.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I have been conferring with various parties interested in the conference report which, of course, is a privileged matter under the rules of the Senate and is the pending business. I would like at this time with the concurrence of the Senate to offer a unanimous-consent request which I believe has been cleared with all principle interests.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the conference report on H.R. 514, the education measure—either on its merits or on a motion to recommit—occur at 2 o'clock on Wednesday afternoon next, and that there be a 4-hour time limitation, the time commencing at 10 a.m. that day to be equally divided between the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) and the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS).

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the distinguished majority leader if his request also carries with it a request with respect to the confirmation of Judge Carswell's nomination, which was the pending business before it was displaced by the present pending business.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I wish I could answer in the affirmative. Unfortunately, I cannot. I have asked some of the Senators interested in the Carswell nomination to come to the Chamber so that I may discuss the matter with them. But I believe that if we could get this unanimous-consent agreement it would be helpful; and we ought to strike while the iron is hot, so to speak.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I note, and as far as I am able to ascertain, there is no Senator present who has announced his opposition to the confirmation of the nomination of Judge Carswell. I note that the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL) is present. Perhaps he could give us some guidance on this matter, and perhaps not.

Mr. PELL. I cannot, because as I said yesterday, I feel squeezed between two filibusters. Personally, I am against Judge Carswell, but I think we ought to vote.

Mr. SCOTT. I commend the Senator for his statement. I would hope we could come to some agreement on the confirmation as well. I also am seeking information as to whether a vote on the confirmation will come on a direct up or down vote or whether it will come, as I have heard discussed, on a motion to recommit.

I take it the Senator from Rhode Island cannot enlighten us on that matter.

Mr. PELL. I cannot.

Mr. SCOTT. Could the distinguished majority leader enlighten us on whether the vote on the confirmation will come on a straight up and down vote or on a motion to recommit?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I have heard rumors and rumblings about a motion to recommit the Carswell nomination to the committee.

I read the RECORD, of course, as all Senators do, and I note that the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. HARRIS) raised that possibility. So I am assuming that when a vote comes on the Carswell nomination it could well be on a motion to recommit. However, I cannot state definitely, because I do not know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would advise the Senator that any Senator at any time he may wish to do so may move to recommit the nomination, and a Senator could move to lay that motion on the table. A motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I have not released that reservation—I would like to state to the distinguished majority leader that some while ago we were engaged in a debate on the Voting Rights Act. And that matter was concluded in order that we could get to the Carswell nomination.

We were in the midst of an extended discussion on the Carswell nomination when that pending business was displaced by the consideration of the conference report on the elementary and secondary education amendments.

It would occur to the junior Senator from Alabama that if there is to be any agreement made on a limitation of time, we ought to turn first to the matter that was first under consideration and not the matter that was second under consideration.

For that reason, and until there is an agreement with respect to the Carswell nomination, a final vote on that matter, the junior Senator from Alabama would just as soon be discussing the pending business as the other pending business, having in mind that the opponents of the Carswell nomination would have the opportunity at any time to bring the debate on the pending question to a close by their agreement to set a time for the vote on the Carswell nomination. So it would be the opponents of the Carswell nomination that would be holding up the vote on the two matters.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a clarification?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I take it that the concern of the junior Senator from Alabama is not that these votes shall take place necessarily at roughly the same moment in time, but that he is seeking to find out whether or not a vote can be taken at some agreed time on the Carswell nomination.

Mr. ALLEN. That is right.

Mr. SCOTT. As well as the conference report.

Mr. ALLEN. It does not matter to the junior Senator from Alabama which comes first so long as they came in fairly rapid succession.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. I wish to ask one question about the vote on the conference report. The request is for a limitation of time. We do not know yet just what the precise issue might be—the possibility of a motion to recommit, or the possibility of just a straight up and down vote.

I suppose the Senator's request would include the idea that once there was an agreement and voting started, then any vote that failed to dispose of the matter would be under controlled time, such as another motion to table.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Of course.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I can well understand the Senator from Alabama reserving his right to object, if he has not objected already. May I say to him that no one is more anxious to vote on the Carswell nomination than is the Senator from Montana. How we get to that juncture is something we have to approach on a graduated basis, as I see it.

If we could get an agreement to vote on Wednesday next on the conference report, I think that would enhance the chances of getting an agreement sometime around that time, hopefully, for a vote on the Carswell nomination. I have no choice, speaking personally, as to what comes first. All I am interested in is the conduct of the affairs of the Senate and facing these issues and disposing of them one way or another.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. For the purpose of information and clarification I wonder, if there were an agreement to vote on Wednesday next on the pending business, if it would be the intention of the majority leader to devote all time between now and then on the conference report, or would it just be to have some agreement that we could go back to the so-called filibuster on the Carswell nomination and let those who wish to speak on the Carswell nomination speak so we would be in a better position to get to a vote on the Carswell nomination shortly after the vote on the pending business?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes. May I say in reply to the distinguished Senator from Michigan that what I had in mind was that if this were agreed to, we would return to the Carswell nomination and not again proceed to the privileged conference report until the 4 hours preceding the vote on Wednesday. In the interim, those who still have remarks on the Carswell nomination could make them. It would be my hope if we could get an agreement of this sort it would speed up the Carswell nomination.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I would like to make an observation. I was in the middle of a speech on the conference report. I would like about 15 minutes more to place matters in the RECORD so that the RECORD may be complete before that subject is laid aside.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is a reasonable request, and it will be granted.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the distinguished majority leader yield further?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to make a point. This suggestion does not come from me but I have heard at least one Senator and maybe others who have discussed the possibility of cloture proceedings with respect to the nomination before us.

I would hope we could get to an agreement but I think it is proper to surface at this time that there is some such talk going around. I hope we could come to some agreement on the nomination so that the work of the Senate can go forward. We have appropriation bills almost ready.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There are 16 stockpile bills on the calendar. They are ready to be debated.

Mr. SCOTT. We have stockpile bills, and, of course, the Supreme Court is being very seriously affected by this delay. I know the Court is holding up a number of matters because it does not think they should be decided by an eight-judge Court. Therefore, there is a matter of public interest involved in getting all of these matters disposed of as soon as we can with all due respect to the fact that every Senator has the right to discuss them until——

Mr. MANSFIELD. Doomsday.

Mr. SCOTT. Doomsday. This is a sacred privilege we have, and we do not want to lose it; yet I do not want to see it abused here.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I would like to make a brief statement at this time which I think will indicate to the Senate as a whole just how effective and efficient it has been in slightly more than 2 months.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG). Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not put the unanimous-consent request objected to by the Senator from Alabama. The Chair asked if there is objection to the majority leader making a statement.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The statement sets out what the joint leadership has been trying to do.

THE 100TH ROLLCALL VOTE OF THE SECOND SESSION

Mr. President, when the Senate approved yesterday the conference report on the Water Quality Improvement Act of 1970 by a vote of 80 to 0, that action was representative of the 100th rollcall vote of the second session of the 91st Congress.

In passing, it might be noted that last year the Senate's 100th rollcall vote took place on October 9, some 9 months after the convening of the first session on January 3. By contrast, the second session has been under way only since January 19 of this year.

I believe the casting of the 100th Senate roll call vote of the second session yesterday speaks well for the record of the Senate and for its entire membership. A number of the significant legislative measures approved in 1970 have been the result of long and arduous scrutiny and efforts undertaken during 1969 and prior years. However, the Members of the Senate during the past 2 months have applied themselves diligently and dutifully to their tasks and have tended to the business of the American people they represent and in trying to translate the people's needs into tangible and meaningful legislative results.

May I express, too, my opinion that it was quite fitting that the 100th vote be on an important measure relating to water pollution control. The protection and preservation of our resources and the enhancement of the overall quality of our environment are assuredly among the Nation's most urgent priorities.

Mr. President, I make this statement at this time—and I consider it germane to the subject under discussion—only to indicate that the Senate has been working at a very rapid and, at the same time, effective pace this year. It has been putting in long hours. There has been little or no grumbling. I hope we will continue on this basis so that the goal which the joint leadership has set of adjournment by Labor Day can be achieved.

I must point out that all the leadership can do is to propose, and it is up to the Senate to dispose. I would like to see this matter brought to a head soon. I want to repeat again, as I did to the Senator from Alabama, there is no one in this Chamber who is more anxious to get a vote on the Carswell nomination than is the Senator from Montana. I can say the same thing with respect to the conference report on the elementary-secondary education bill—the privileged matter which is now pending and which has been pending since last Tuesday.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. First, I want to join with what the distinguished majority leader has said. He and I began this parallel with last year's session sometime back. From time to time one or the other of us do mention the number of votes, the fact that we have worked not only harder but more effectively and efficiently this year, and that we are 9 months ahead of last year. That is a good record in any league. I am delighted that we are.

We have temporarily run into a couple of hurdles, but Senators have had a good deal of high hurdling experience over the years.

I have heard it said that there is a very real possibility that we can have an agreement to vote on the nomination pending before us on April 7. I bring this up for the purpose of indicating to the distinguished majority leader, with whom I share the desire to get all these matters disposed of, that possibly, if he would be willing, as he always is, to explore further with his colleagues the possibility of an agreement to have a vote on the nomination on April 7 and a vote next Wednesday on the conference report, we might find some goodwill now prevalent on both of those matters.

Mr. MANSFIELD. That is putting it off an awfully long time.

Mr. SCOTT. I agree. I cannot do any better.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We were going to have a vote on it this week. Now we want to go beyond next week. I think the Senate should face up to its responsibility a little more efficiently.

Mr. SCOTT. I would rather vote sooner.

Mr. MANSFIELD. We ought to recognize that the people's business comes first, and I see no reason why we should wait until April 7. We have important legislation pending. I do not think much more can be said on the Carswell nomination. Frankly, I would hope we could come to a decision earlier than that, preferably next Wednesday or Thursday soon after a vote on the pending proposal.

Mr. SCOTT. I would agree to vote now. I was willing to agree to the seventh for fear that it might be the ninth if not then.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Knowing the realities that we face, that Senators can talk, and there are enough Senators opposed to the Carswell nomination so that the time could be filled in easily, I have a suggestion to make to the majority leader. I have not seen it done, but I do not see why it is not possible in the same unanimous-consent agreement to agree that the consideration of the nomination may, for certain bills, be set aside. Then the majority leader could deal next week with a whole group of legislation, even including appropriation bills. No time would be lost which could have been filled up with talk which the majority leader might consider unnecessary but which the opponents of the Carswell nomination consider necessary discussions, and therefore days certain could be fixed for votes, so we would not be delaying anything. I do this as a constructive suggestion to the majority leader.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I can read the handwriting on the wall as well as the next Senator. As I said, the leadership can only propose; it is up to the Senate to dispose, and there are many means, many avenues, which can be utilized in lengthening the debate, in discussing various kinds of subjects, eating up time, and delaying the business of the Senate.

Would the distinguished minority leader——

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. If I may finish this thought first.

Would the Senator agree to vote on April 6, rather than April 7, which is a Tuesday. Waiting until a week from next Tuesday is too long to wait. Preferably the Senate could vote next week.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, I would agree to April 6. I would agree to vote now.

I would point out to all parties participant here that there is a way to have a vote here today or tomorrow, and that would be for a Senator who favored the nomination—the majority leader is familiar with this precedent, and I have seen my predecessor, the late great Senator from Illinois, use this very device—move, today or tomorrow, to recommit, with the announcement that he was going to vote against it, and immediately have a motion to table, and the issue would be before us. We can do that if we cannot have an agreement. So I am politely saying something to the Senator from Montana which I hope others will hear.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes; I join the distinguished Republican leader and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) in their proposals. I hope some Senator will make a motion so we can face up to this matter.

I yield now to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, first let me suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I was listening.

Mr. SCOTT. That was the purpose of the exercise.

Mr. BAYH. I feel flattered.

Just as one Member of the Senate who is very much opposed to the Carswell nomination, let me repeat what I said in the colloquy with our distinguished colleague from Delaware yesterday. As far as the Senator from Indiana is concerned, we are not involved in a filibuster. As I see it now, I have no intention of getting involved in a filibuster, but as I suggested in conversation with the leader this morning, I am willing to agree to a day certain. I am only one Member of the Senate.

I think it is only fair to point out, with all due respect to the analysis of our leader, that I do not share his opinion that everything has been said that legitimately can be said. Just this morning we made available for public scrutiny the result of the entire caseload of appealed cases that has been rendered by the fifth circuit from 1959 to 1969. We related Judge Carswell's record with all 66 other judges in the circuit.

It seems to me this type of information is relevant to the debate. It does not fall in the category of filibuster. It goes to the qualifications of Judge Carswell.

At the time any member of the opposition resorts to purely delaying tactics, then I think we can be subject to criticism as being in the area of filibuster. I hope we will never get to that particular place. As the Senator from Rhode Island suggested so eloquently yesterday almost in one breath, he was opposed to the nomination of Judge Carswell but equally opposed to anything which might delay until doomsday, to quote our distinguished majority leader, getting to a vote.

So I am perfectly willing to follow up the suggestion of the leadership after consultation with other Senators. I can speak only for one Member, but I am quite willing to get it to a vote.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would the Senator be in favor of voting the sixth?

Mr. BAYH. The Senator from Indiana would be in favor of a unanimous-consent agreement for a motion to recommit being set for no later than high noon, or 1 o'clock, or 2 o'clock, on the sixth. Out of courtesy to some other Members of the opposition, I feel I should take the next 15 or 20 minutes to consult with them. But my personal opinion is that that would be a good reconciliation. I am not saying I am not prepared to vote sooner than that, but that I am willing to accept that, and I can speak only for myself.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAYH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Assuming the motion to recommit was rejected, would the Senator be willing to have a vote then on the confirmation of the nomination itself?

Mr. BAYH. I would have to discuss that with other Members of the opposition.

Mr. ALLEN. I see.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, since the Senator mentioned my name?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. We had a colloquy on this matter last night, in trying to expedite a way to get to a vote. Since referring to the lengthy debate on the Carswell nomination as a filibuster was somewhat embarrassing to some liberal Members of the Senate, I made an agreement that I would not refer to this filibuster as a filibuster any longer, but would refer to it as an extended talkathon which means an unnecessary waste of time. I shall from now on continue to refer to this filibuster as an extended talkathon rather than what it actually is.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, there are various ways and means of getting a point across, and, as I have said, I can read the writing on the wall as well as the next Senator.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, with the permission of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and this may well be a live quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

[No. 109 Leg.]

Aiken	Hansen	Proxmire
Allen	Hart	Saxbe
Bayh	Hatfield	Schweiker
Byrd, Va.	Javits	Scott
Byrd, W. Va.	Long	Smith, Ill.
Cranston	Mansfield	Sparkman
Ellender	McCarthy	Stennis
Ervin	Pell	Talmadge
Griffin	Prouty	Williams, Del.

Mr. BYRD of West Virginia. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. BIBLE), the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. HOLLINGS), the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), the Senator from Washington (Mr. MAGNUSON), the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. MONTOYA), the Senator from Utah (Mr. Moss), the Senator from Connecticut (Mr. RIBICOFF), and the Senator from Georgia (Mr. RUSSELL) are necessarily absent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I announce that the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from California (Mr. MURPHY), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY) are necessarily absent.

The Senator from South Dakota (Mr. MUNDT) is absent because of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After some delay, the following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Allott	Fulbright	Miller
Bellmon	Goldwater	Mondale
Bennett	Goodell	Muskie
Boggs	Gore	Nelson
Brooke	Gravel	Packwood
Burdick	Gurney	Pastore
Cannon	Harris	Pearson
Case	Hartke	Randolph
Church	Holland	Smith, Maine
Cook	Hruska	Spong
Cooper	Hughes	Stevens
Cotton	Inouye	Symington
Curtis	Jackson	Thurmond
Dodd	Jordan, N.C.	Tower
Dole	Jordan, Idaho	Tydings
Dominick	McClellan	Williams, N.J.
Eagleton	McGee	Yarborough
Eastland	McGovern	Young, N. Dak.
Fannin	McIntyre	Young, Ohio
Fong	Metcalf

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT REQUEST

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, again, with the permission of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, I have nothing definite to add at this time because negotiations are still underway to see if there is not some way we can bring about a consent agreement affecting the Carswell nomination and the privileged conference report on the elementary and secondary education amendments.

I think some progress is being made. But only time will tell whether the efforts now underway are sufficiently successful.

So, I would suggest that Senators stay near the Chamber for the next 15 or 20 minutes, or not to exceed one-half hour, and that in the meantime we allow the distinguished Senator from North Carolina to proceed.

Hopefully, within that period of time, it will be possible to propose some kind of unanimous-consent request which may be granted if the Senator is willing. But until then, I can give no further information.

EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS OF ASSISTANCE FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 514) to extend programs of assistance for elementary and secondary education, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MONDALE). The Chair recognizes the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, yesterday I was discussing the strange judicial decisions which have been handed down to implement the demands of certain pressure groups and the demands of certain very sincere citizens that the public schools should be forcibly integrated regardless of the wishes of the parents and the schoolchildren attending the schools.

Yesterday I pointed out that in the Jefferson County School Board case, two of the three sitting Federal judges ignored the plain words of an act of Congress. This means the Federal judges in that case ignored the majority vote of 100 Senators and the majority vote of 435 Representatives and held that Congress did not mean what it said when it prohibited the assignment of children to schools to overcome racial imbalance and the busing of children to achieve racial balance. Former Senator Hubert Humphrey, the floor manager of the bill, in the Senate debate on the 1964 Civil Rights Act made the intent of Congress very plain in this area when he alluded to a case which arose in Gary, Ind., and involved de facto segregation.

I mentioned yesterday that I wished to discuss the wrong decision of Judge Wright in the District of Columbia. This decision bears the title of Hobson against Hansen and appears in 200 Fed. Supp. at page 401 and the following pages.

In this opinion, Judge J. Skelly Wright clearly demonstrates that judges are not competent to tell how schools ought to be operated.

He took 118 pages to instruct the School Board of the District of Columbia how it should go about desegregating public schools of the District which are segregated because of the residential patterns of the District and to tell the School Board, school administrators, and teachers how they should instruct the children after they had achieved the desegregation of schools which were segregated because of residential patterns.

The District of Columbia had what was called the track system. The track system groups students according to their ability to learn. By so doing, it avoids the very deplorable situation in which bright students and dull students and diligent students and lazy students are assigned to the same classrooms, and in which the same quantity of intellectual food, regardless of their capacity to assimilate it, is attempted to be fed them.

Judge J. Skelly Wright, whose abilities as an educator are refuted in large measure by his opinions, handed down a strange decision: that under the Constitution of the United States, as it has been mangled in school desegregation cases, it is unconstitutional for any public school to undertake to teach a bright or a diligent student anything more than it attempts to teach to a dull or a lazy student. In other words, under this miraculous decision, according to Judge Wright, the Constitution of the United States now requires in the public schools of this Nation an equality of inferiority. That is the sort of adjudication made in Hobson against Hansen. I deny with all the emphasis at my command that the Constitution of my country requires any such fool thing as that.

I say that the public schools are designed, or ought to be designed, to do what a former Governor of my State, Charles Brantley Aycock, declared: To aid every student in an effort to become everything that God Almighty made it possible for him to become. Yet, in this case we have a solid adjudication that the Constitution of the United States as now applied to the public school system forbids a public school from undertaking to teach anything more to a bright or a diligent student than it attempts to teach to a dull or a lazy student.

I deny that the Constitution of my country requires such an equality of inferiority. Yet that is the decision of Judge Wright in this case, and it demonstrates quite clearly the incapacity of Federal judges to discharge the duties of school boards. I think we should return to a system that confines Federal judges to their duties and deprives them of the power to undertake to tell school boards how they shall run the schools.

Now, we have some other decisions. Back in the 1830's there was a resident of Philadelphia, Stephen Girard, who by his hard work and by his business acumen amassed what was for that day a considerable fortune. He left a last will and testament in which he created a trust whereby he left his property, or he left a considerable amount of his property, in trust with directions that it be used to conduct a college for the education of poor white orphan boys.

About 135 or 140 years after Stephen Girard had descended into the tongueless silence of dreamless dust, the Federal courts, in effect, wrote a codicil to the will of Stephen Girard whereby they confiscated the private property he had left in trust for private use and they gave his trust no compensation whatever. And this was done under a Constitution which says you cannot take private property for even public use except upon the payment of just compensation.

Then there was a testator in the State of Virginia who endowed Sweet Briar College by a will which devoted her property to the support of Sweet Briar College in order that it might afford education for white girls. By the same process of legal legerdemain the Supreme Court handed down a decision entitled "Sweet Briar Institute v. Button, 387 U.S. 423." In effect, they wrote a codicil to the will of the testator in that case and said that the property the testator had amassed should be devoted in part to purposes other than those authorized by the testator's will.

So in this great zest to bring about forced integration of education institutions, we have had judicial opinions which rewrite the wills of testators who have been slumbering in the tongueless slumber of dreamless dust for generations, testators who entertained the correct opinion while they walked the earth's surface that the disposition of property by will is a matter for the owners of the property rather than for Federal judges ascending the bench long after they have gone to that bourn from which no traveler returns.

Those are some of the absurd decisions which have been made by those who think the way to realize the American dream is to convert it into a nightmare where there will be no freedom and where there will be no equality except in the absence of freedom.

There is another Federal decision that bears some comment, a decision by the Supreme Court in the case of Green v. County School Board of New Kent County, Virginia, 391 U.S. 430.

I charge, without fear of successful contradiction, that this decision horribly distorts the equal protection clause of the 14th amendment. The equal protection clause of the 14th amendment applies to States. It has no possible application to individuals, except those individuals who might be acting as agents or officers of States. It merely says that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. By this it means that no State shall treat people differently if they are similarly situated.

Three years before the Supreme Court handed down its decision in the Green case, the school board of New Kent County, a rural county in Virginia, which had only two schools, the Watkins School and the New Kent School, abolished the last vestige of State-imposed segregation and gave all of the children in that county, black and white, an absolute right to go to whichever of those two schools that the county maintained they desired.

None of the white children shifted from the New Kent School, which had been a white school during the days of segregation, and only about 150 of the colored children shifted from the Watkins School, which had been a Negro school during the days of segregation, to the New Kent County School.

It is to be noted that there is not a single syllable in the equal protection clause that places any limitation upon the freedom of any human being who is an individual anywhere in the United States. The equal protection clause is no limitation upon the freedom of any individual. But some of the Justices of the Supreme Court did not like the way these little children, black and white, saw fit to exercise their freedom, and they handed down a decision which is murky and ambiguous and which presents no workable rule for the guidance of school administrators.

The effect of that decision is that they said freedom of choice was all right, was perfectly constitutional, if the little children, black and white, exercised their freedom of choice in the manner in which the Supreme Court Justices thought they ought to exercise it. This is the effect of the decision; it is not the legal jargon used in the opinion. But they held that in that particular case the freedom of choice given to the children, both black and white, of New Kent County by the school board did not satisfy the Supreme Court decision in the second Brown. The only reason they gave for this was that the children given the freedom of choice to go to any school did not mix themselves racially in the undefined proportions which the Supreme Court Justices sitting in that case thought they should have done.

In other words, schoolchildren and the parents of schoolchildren can have freedom in this land of ours if, and only if, they exercise their freedom in an undefined manner pleasing to Supreme Court Justices. But if American citizens who happen to be children or the parents of children elect to exercise their freedom according to their own judgments rather than in the manner in which Supreme Court Justices think they ought to exercise it, they can have no freedom.

I deny that under the Constitution of my country the freedom of Americans hangs on such an arbitrary and such a capricious and such a tenuous judicial thread as that.

Mr. President, I could quote the strange decisions we have had in the effort to force integration of the schools against the wishes of people of communities and against the wishes of parents and against the wishes of little children. For example, according to the Charlotte News, of Charlotte, N.C., under a decree rendered by a Federal judge sitting on the western district of North Carolina a few weeks ago, 23,000 children are to be bused from their respective homes, in many cases to distant schools, merely to mix them in the schools in a proportion of 71 to 29 percent white and black. In other words, under this theory of forced integration, we have the Federal Government more interested in the integration of the bodies of little children than it is in the enlightenment of their minds. We have our public schools being converted into integrating institutions rather than educating institutions.

A number of articles have been written recently which indicate that the people of the United States, and even some people who at one time believed in forced integration, are having second thoughts about this matter.

On February 26, 1970, an article appeared in the Wall Street Journal under the name of Vermont Royster, its editor. It started with the quotation of the words of Stewart Alsop in Newsweek. The quotation is this:

> Surely it is time to face up to a fact that can no longer be hidden from view. The attempt to integrate this country's schools is a tragic failure.

Now, during the course of this article, which is entitled, "Forced Integration: Suffer the Children," the writer said this, speaking of racial imbalances in neighborhoods and in schools:

> Or let us suppose the proportion does change. Let us suppose that for some reason—any reason, including prejudice—large numbers of white families move out of the neighborhood, making room for black people to move in, so that after a few years we have entirely reversed the proportions. The neighborhood becomes 95% black, 5% white.
> Again we have an imbalance. Again we do not truly have segregation but call it that, if you wish; de facto segregation. In any event we do not have integration in the sense that there is a general mixing together of the blacks and whites.
> Now suppose that we act from the assumption that this is wrong. That it is wrong to have the neighborhood either 95% white or 95% black. That the mix, to be "right," must be some particular proportion.
> What action is to be taken? In the first instance, do we by law forcefully remove some of the white families from the neighborhood so that we can force in the "proper" number of black families? Or, in the second instance, do we by law prohibit some of the white families from moving out of the neighborhood? If we do either, who decides who moves, who stays?
> The example, of course, is fanciful. We do none of this. No one has had the political temerity to propose a law that would send soldiers to pick people up and move them, or to block the way and prevent them from moving. No one stands up and says this is the moral thing to do.

Stated thus baldly, the immorality of doing such things is perfectly clear. No one thinks it moral to send policemen, or the National Guard, bayonets in hand, to corral people and force them into a swimming pool, or a public park or a cocktail party when they do not wish to go.

No one pretends this is moral—for all that anyone may deplore people's prejudice—because everyone can see that to do this is to make of our society a police state. The methods, whatever the differences in intent, would be no different from the tramping boots of the Communist, Nazi or Fascistic police states.

All this being fanciful, no one proposing such things, it may seem we have strayed far from the school integration program. But have we?

The essence of that program is that we have tried to apply to our schools the methods we would not dream of applying to other parts of society. We have forced the children to move.

There are many things wrong with the forcible transfer of children from school to school to obtain the "proper" racial mix. It is, for one thing, wasteful of time, energy and money that could better be applied to making all schools better.

To this practical objection there is also the fact that in concept it is arrogant. The unspoken idea it rests upon is that black children will somehow gain from putting their black skins near to white skins. This is the reverse coin of the worst segregationist's idea that somehow the white children will suffer from putting their white skins near to black skins.

Both are insolent assertions of white superiority. Both spring from the same bitter seed.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORCED INTEGRATION: SUFFER THE CHILDREN

(By Vermont Royster)

"Surely it is time to face up to a fact that can no longer be hidden from view. The attempt to integrate this country's schools is a tragic failure."

The words of Stewart Alsop in Newsweek will serve as well as any. They are startling, honest and deeply true. Whatever anyone else says otherwise, however shocked we may be, we know he is right.

The proof lies in the fact that Congress, in a confused sort of way, has made it clear that it no longer thinks forced integration is the way to El Dorado. Since Congress is a political body, that in itself might be evidence enough. But Mr. Alsop has also put the statement up for challenge to a wide range of civil rights leaders, black and white, ranging from Education Commissioner James Allen to black militant Julius Hobson, and found none to deny it. Beyond that, we have only to look around ourselves, at both our white and our black neighbors, to know that the failure is there.

But that only plunges us into deeper questions. Why is it a failure? And why is it tragic? Why is it that something on which so many men of good will put their faith has at last come to this? Where did we go wrong?

And those questions plunge us yet deeper. For to answer them we must go back to the beginning. It is the moment for one of those agonizing reappraisals of all our hopes, emotions, thoughts, about what is surely the most wretched of all the problems before our society.

A SIMPLE PROPOSITION

We begin, I think, with a simple proposition. It is that it was, and is morally wrong for a society to say to one group of people that because of their color they are pariahs—that the majesty of law can be used to segregate them in their homes, in their schools, in their livelihoods, in their social contacts with their fellows. The wrong is in no wise mitigated by any plea that society may provide well for them within their segregated state. That has nothing to do with the moral question.

In 1954, for the first time, the Supreme Court stated that moral imperative. Beginning with the school decision the judges in a series of decisions struck down the legal underpinnings of segregation.

Since emotions and prejudices are not swept away by court decisions there were some white people in all parts of the country who resisted the change. But they were, for all their noise, in the minority. The great body of our people, even in the South where prejudice had congealed into custom, began the task of stripping away the battens of segregation. Slowly, perhaps, but relentlessly.

Then some people—men of good will, mostly—said this was not enough. They noticed that the mere ending of segregation did not mix whites and blacks in social intercourse. Neighborhoods remained either predominantly white or black. So did schools, because our schools are related to our neighborhoods. So did many other things. Not because of the law, but because of habit, economics, preferences—or prejudices, if you prefer.

From this came the concept of "de facto" segregation. This Latin phrase, borrowed from the law, describes any separation of whites and blacks that exists in fact and equates it with the segregation proscribed by law. The cause matters not. These men of good will concluded that if segregation in law is bad then any separation that exists in fact is equally bad.

From this view we were led to attack any separation as de facto segregation. Since the first attack on segregation came in the schools, the schools became the first place for the attack on separation from whatever cause. And since the law had served us well in the first instance, we chose—our lawmakers chose—to use the law for the second purpose also. The law, that is, was applied to compel not merely an end to segregation but an end to separation by forced integration.

It was at this point that we fell into the abyss. The error was not merely that we created a legal monstrosity, or something unacceptable politically to both whites and blacks. The tragedy is that we embraced an idea morally wrong.

That must be recognized if we are to understand all else. For what is wrong about forced integration in the schools is not its impracticality, which we all now see, but its immorality, which is not yet fully grasped.

Let us consider.

Imagine, now, a neighborhood in which 95% of the people are white, 5% of them black. It is self-evident that we have here a de facto imbalance. We do not have legal segregation, but we do not have integration either, at least not anything more than "tokenism."

Let us suppose also that for some reason—any reason, economics, white hostilities, or perhaps black prejudice against living next door to whites—the proportion does not change. The only way then to change it is for some of the whites to move away and, concurrently, for some blacks who live elsewhere to move into this neighborhood. One is not enough. Both things must happen.

CREATING AN IMBALANCE

Or let us suppose the proportion does change. Let us suppose that for some reason—any reason, including prejudice—large numbers of white families move out of the neighborhood, making room for black people to move in, so that after a few years we have entirely reversed the proportions. The neighborhood becomes 95% black, 5% white.

Again we have an imbalance. Again we do not truly have segregation but call it that, if you wish; de facto segregation. In any event we do not have integration in the sense that there is a general mixing together of the blacks and whites.

Now suppose that we act from the assumption that this is wrong. That it is wrong to have the neighborhood either 95% white or 95% black. That the mix, to be "right," must be some particular proportion.

What action is to be taken? In the first instance, do we by law forcefully remove some of the white families from the neighborhood so that we can force in the "proper" number of black families? Or, in the second instance, do we by law prohibit some of the white families from moving out of the neighborhood? If we do either, who decides who moves, who stays?

The example, of course, is fanciful. We do none of this. No one has the political temerity to propose a law that would send soldiers to pick people up and move them, or to block the way and prevent them from moving. No one stands up and says this is the moral thing to do.

Stated thus baldly, the immorality of doing such things is perfectly clear. No one thinks it moral to send policemen, or the National Guard bayonets in hand, to corral people and force them into a swimming pool, or a public park or a cocktail party when they do not wish to go.

No one pretends this is moral—for all that anyone may deplore people's prejudice—because everyone can see that to do this is to make of our society a police state. The methods, whatever the differences in intent, would be no different from the tramping boots of the Communist, Nazi, or Fascistic police states.

All this being fanciful, no one proposing such things, it may seem we have strayed far from the school integration program. But have we?

The essence of that program is that we have tried to apply to our schools the methods we would not dream of applying to other parts of society. We have forced the children to move.

There are many things wrong with the forcible transfer of children from school to school to obtain the "proper" racial mix. It is, for one thing, wasteful of time, energy and money that could better be applied to making all schools better.

To this practical objection there is also the fact that in concept it is arrogant. The unspoken idea it rests upon is that black children will somehow gain from putting their black skins near to white skins. This is the reverse coin of the worst segregationist's idea that somehow the white children will suffer from putting their white skins near to black skins.

Both are insolent assertions of white superiority. Both spring from the same bitter seed.

Still, the practical difficulties might be surmounted. The implied arrogance might be overlooked, on the grounds that the alleged superiority is not racial but cultural; or that, further, both whites and blacks will gain from mutual association. That still leaves the moral question.

Perhaps it should be restated. Is it moral for society to apply to children the force which, if it were applied to adults, men would know immoral? What charity, what compassion, what morality is there in forcing a child as we would not force his father?

It is a terrible thing to see, as we have seen, soldiers standing guard so that a black child may enter a white school. You cannot help but cringe in shame that only this way is it done. But at least then the soldiers are standing for a moral principle—that no one, child or adult, shall be barred by the color of his skin from access to what belongs to us all, white or black.

But it would have been terrifying if those same soldiers had been going about the town rounding up the black children and marching them from their accustomed school to another, while they went fearfully and their parents wept. On that, I verily believe, morality will brook no challenge.

Thus, then, the abyss. It opened because in fleeing from one moral wrong of the past, for which we felt guilty, we fled all unaware to another immorality. The failure is tragic because in so doing we heaped the burdens upon our children, who are helpless.

MUST WE TURN BACK

Does this mean, as many men of good will fear, that to recognize as much, to acknowledge the failure of forced integration in the schools, is to surrender, to turn backward to what we have fled from?

Surely not. There remains, and we as a people must insist upon it, the moral imperative that no one should be denied his place in society, his dignity as a human being, because of his color. Not in the schools only, but in his livelihood and his life. No custom, no tradition, no trickery should be allowed to evade that imperative.

That we can insist upon without violating the other moral imperative. So long as he does not encroach upon others, no man should be compelled to walk where he would not walk, live where he would not live, share what company he would shun, think what he would not think, believe what he believes not.

If we grasp the distinction, we will follow a tragic failure with a giant step. And, God willing, not just in the schools.

Mr. ERVIN. As Mr. Royster suggests, it would be as sensible to send out policemen or National Guardsmen to round up black and white people and require them to go swimming together in a public swimming pool, to prove that the swimming pool had been desegregated, as it is to round up little black and white children and deny them the right to attend their neighborhood schools, and put them on buses and transport them to distant points merely to integrate their bodies.

Yet, as the article so well points out, that is precisely what the Federal Government has been doing, what HEW has been doing, and what the Federal courts have been doing in their efforts to supplant outmoded State segregation in the schools with federally coerced integration.

It is about time that we get realistic and realize that you cannot have a free society if you are going to have activities on the part of the Federal Government which convert the little children into the hapless and helpless subjects of judicial or bureaucratic oligarchies, and that is precisely what forced school integration is. We are not going to have peace in this area of our national life, we are not going to rid ourselves of the tensions in this field, until we restore the United States to a free society, and say that it is constitutional and legal for State and local school boards to grant to schoolchildren the right to attend the public schools they wish to attend.

As Judge Parker so well pointed out in the Briggs case, there is nothing in the Constitution, and there is nothing in the Brown case, which outlaws freedom of choice. As Judge Parker said, "Where a school board opens all the schools in its jurisdiction to children of all races and allows them or their parents to select the schools they attend, the school board is acting in perfect harmony with the equal protection clause because it is treating all parents and all schoolchildren of all races exactly alike." Despite what Justice Brennan stated in the Green Case, oceans of judicial sophistry cannot wash out the plain and obvious truth that the best way for a school board to afford equal protection of the laws to all parents and all schoolchildren is to say to them, "You have the freedom to attend any of the public schools under our jurisdiction which are open to children of your ages and intellectual attainments that you wish to attend."

On March 24, 1970, an article was published in the Wall Street Journal entitled "Beyond Education's Status Symbolism," written by Harley L. Lutz, a professor emeritus of public finance at Princeton University.

He points out in this article that the important thing in education is teaching people and developing the personalities of children; and he points out how this Nation departed from that proper course of conduct in the effort to give priority to forced integration of schools.

This article by Dr. Lutz merits the serious consideration of everyone charged with any official duty having reference to public education in this country. He speaks about the essentials of a good education, and about the wisdom of our abandoning the concept of forced integration in favor of quality education, and he closes the article with this very significant sentence:

These objectives should receive the main thrust of judicial concern and of official inquiry. When the quality of education for all children is raised, it will not matter where that better education is obtained.

So I close what I have to say on this occasion with the statement that it is time to recognize that the cause of education is not promoted by forced integration against the will of parents and against the will of schoolchildren, and by perverting and distorting sound legal and constitutional principles. The important thing is to educate the children, not to integrate them.

I ask unanimous consent that the entire article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEYOND EDUCATION'S STATUS SYMBOLISM

(By Harley L. Lutz)

More than 15 years have passed since the Supreme Court announced its reversal of the doctrine of separate but equal accommodations for whites and blacks with respect to public transportation, schools and other public service facilities. The new policy became effective with reasonable promptness in some cases but delay and resistance developed in others.

The dual school system maintained in the states with the greatest concentration of black population was separate but not always equal. After World War II, however, many places had provided school facilities for blacks that generally were equal to those for whites. With the large-scale migration of blacks into northern cities, settlement patterns then developed that meant the schools in urban sections occupied mainly by blacks were in fact separate. Similar segregation existed in the urban areas occupied mainly by Puerto Ricans and other minority groups. And as any urban or rural area begins to deteriorate economically, the public buildings—schools, post office or whatnot—tend to deteriorate in step with the decay of housing and streets. School buildings in poor white sections are often in no better condition than those in poor black areas.

The decision in Brown vs. Board of Education did not involve the most important issue in the public education and no actions taken under that case will contribute to a solution. Equality of civil rights is deemed to include the right of black children to be enrolled in a white school. Complete school integration has come to mean that there must be a mixture of whites and blacks in every school. If there are no white children in an all-black community and no black children in an all-white community, the imbalance is supposed to be corrected by cross-shipment of pupils in numbers that will provide the proper mix.

The symbolism of the concept is self-evident. If a genuine educational motive were involved, and black pupils were to be moved into white schools because of the better educational facilities, the shift would benefit only those who were transferred. However, the white pupils who were shifted into the supposedly inferior black schools would be penalized. Actually, no question of comparative school efficiency is involved.

It is time the status symbolism of the current concept of school integration be set aside. Instead, our attention and energy might be devoted to the task of redefining the primary purpose of education and of formulating the steps to be taken to improve the quality of education for all children.

SOCIETY'S SURVIVAL

If our society is to survive and make steady advances in well-being, its first and major obligation is to equip the young of each new generation to meet the duties, privileges and responsibilities of adulthood. This obligation rests in part on parents and in part on society.

It must be admitted that parents can often be remiss, not always because of indifference but because of the sweeping changes in economic condition and the social structure. It is no longer necessary for every member of the family to have certain tasks or "chores" when almost everything about the house can be done by pushing a button. The daily chores had a disciplinary value and contributed to family unity. There was youthful rebellion against them, just as there is youthful rebellion today against the dullness of life in an affluent environment in which the young seem to have no significant place.

Society's role for the young is performed mainly through the school system. The first essential of a good school is good teaching. This is one of the most difficult of professions and top-flight practitioners are in short supply. Every normal child has great curiosity and eagerness to learn. Good teaching is required to sustain and expand these attitudes.

Adequate physical plant is useful but subordinate. There was often better teaching in the "little red school house" than is now found in the most modern and expensive school buildings. Too often, so much is spent—under the pressures of architects, contractors and local rivalries—on the school plant that the debt service-cost squeezes the salary side of the budget. Building janitors are often paid more than teachers.

Complaints about the poor quality of teaching abound, from elementary schools to the universities. The curriculum of teacher training in the schools of education has tended to emphasize method rather than content and many states have based certification rules on this policy.

The emphasis of university administrators on research and publication as conditions of tenure and promotion has relegated teaching to the background. Any official examination of the educational system must dig deeply into these practices.

The population explosion since the 1930s has contributed to the decline of teaching quality at all levels. Birth-rate statistics provided a warning but it went unnoticed until too late. In consequence there have been unduly large classes, makeshift quarters, short sessions and automatic promoting of all pupils up the line regardless of achievement. The white-black mixture rule does nothing to better this situation, under which good and incompetent teachers alike have been helpless, the courts would do a better service for the quality of education if they were to impress on negligent school boards and communities the need for establishing the conditions under which good teaching would be again possible.

A second essential of a good school system is that it be, in every respect, a community undertaking, identified with the community and loyally supported by it. Parents have, or should have, more concern about the quality of education provided for their children than anyone else. This is a major reason for the tradition that the chief responsibility for elementary and secondary education should be vested in the communities to be served.

Support means more than financing, although the local share of the cost should be substantial. It means more than pride in the basketball team and the marching band. These and other extracurricular activities are useful outlets for youthful energy and enthusiasm and they contribute to the overall sense of community satisfaction. Local support also means, however, a close and sympathetic relation between parents and school staff, with complete freedom of communication regarding educational and disciplinary problems through parent-teacher groups and various other arrangements.

The current judicial application of the integration rule disrupts the basic concept of the community school. Forcible transfer of white or black pupils into an alien community deprives these pupils, and their parents, of that sympathetic relationship so important for a good attitude on both sides. Teachers and parents can no longer communicate with regard to the problems of individual pupils. The latter can have no sense of belonging and, no chance of sharing in extra-curricular activities.

And every parent, whether white or black, might have good reason to appeal the selection of his or her children for transfer as there is no equitable way of making the choice. A case could be made that arbitrary transfer of a pupil to a school outside its community would be a violation of the child's civil rights.

Every good purpose of the integration concept would be served if it were interpreted to mean that all schools were to be open to all children of the community, regardless of color or racial origin. The degree of mixture could then be governed by the residential pattern. As it becomes normal and acceptable for different races and national groups to live in the same community, it will be equally acceptable for all children to attend the same school. Except for large-scale, subsidized housing projects, this change will come slowly—despite legislative efforts to hasten it. But it will come, as a natural evolution that will lack the bitterness and animosity engendered by current policies. Cross-shipment of children will not hasten the rate of change in residential patterns. It could, in fact, increase resistance to change.

The resort to private schools in some places is an understandable reaction to judicial harshness. But as an expression of antagonism to genuine, realistic integration of any sort it is as wrong as the current, legalistic application of the concept.

Such private schools are likely to be makeshift, with inadequate financing and dubious quality of teaching. Even the moderate tuition may be a barrier to some white children. This subterfuge will penalize the children put into such schools just as the children will be penalized who may be shifted out of their home community by judicial order.

THE THIRD ESSENTIAL

A third essential of the good school system is wise selection and judicious emphasis on what is to be taught. The current judicial policy is indifferent to this matter, although a genuine concern for the future of the children would rank it above formalistic mixture.

The scientific and technological explosion has widened the field of knowledge so greately that no one can possibly learn all about everything. There is a temptation, however, to broaden the secondary, and even the elementary, curriculum to cover more territory. These contacts with ever wider fields of knowledge are brief and limited and, however alluring, they tend to involve neglect of the real foundation of education. This foundation is now, as it has always been, thorough training in what was once described as the "three R's." Of these, reading and writing are certainly fundamental to all further educational accomplishment.

Reading means more than recognition of words on the printed page. It means understanding of the message conveyed by the works. Writing means more than the ability to put down words on a piece of paper. It means the ability to express, through written words, a coherent, logical train of thought. College students are sometimes deficient in both respects, and their spelling is often atrocious. And yet, without command of these basic tools of the learning process, how can the young be expected to benefit from all of the additional knowledge to which they are exposed and which they are expected to absorb?

The precise content and emphasis of elementary and secondary curricula, and the extent to which state or Federal dictation should occur as the price of supplying part of the funds, are matters beyond the scope of this article. It should be said, however, that since an important aspect of the preparation that the schools are to provide involves the ability to earn a living, the obligation to supply an introduction to various kinds of vocational training must be recognized.

Much more must be done through redirection of our educational program and emphasis to prepare the young for self-support. Just as there should be an open door and freedom of access to the schools for all the children of each community, so there must be access for all youth to the opportunities for acquiring skills on which a future good livelihood depends. These objectives should receive the main thrust of judicial concern and of official inquiry. When the quality of education for all children is raised, it will not matter where that better education is obtained.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield the floor, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, am I correct in saying that the Pastore rule of germaneness is no longer applicable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

S. 3634—INTRODUCTION OF THE NATIONAL HEALTH CARE SYSTEMS STUDY, RESEARCH, AND DEMONSTRATIONS ACT OF 1970

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend and extend section 304 of the Public Health Service Act which is to be cited as the "National Health Care Systems Study, Research, and Demonstrations Act of 1970."

In my statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 10, 1969, I described the reasons why I believe our present national nonsystem of delivery of health care must be replaced. The reasons are now quite well known, having been discussed since that time in numerous national magazines and in statements by other Members of the Congress.

In my statement I emphasized the need for utilizing a systems approach to our Nation's health crisis in order that we do not overlook the fact that the replacement of our present nonsystem of delivery of health care may not only involve a new financing mechanism, such as national health insurance, but it may also require additional health manpower and new methods of health care delivery.

Following my statement, the Surgeon General, Dr. Jesse Steinfeld, in response to my interrogatory, stated:

> It seems to me, speaking as an individual, that we are moving toward a national health insurance program and it is our duty to be ready for it in terms of not only the capacity to provide the services, but in terms of the administrative mechanisms to have an efficient program. I feel, therefore, that it is imperative for us to begin both such experiments and pilot programs as soon as possible.

In a January issue of Business Week magazine, an editorial commented:

> The question no longer is whether the U.S. is to have a national health program. It is whether we shall have a good one or a bad one. The chances of getting a good one will be far better if everyone involved accepts that fact.

Mr. President, the bill I introduce today is designed to insure that the national health insurance program, which Dr. Steinfeld, like myself, believes is inevitable, is "a good one" as Business Week recommends.

The National Health Care Systems Study, Research and Demonstrations Act of 1970 provides for the extension and increased authorizations for the experiments and research which the Surgeon General believes is necessary to prepare for an eventual national health insurance program, and it calls for the systems approach toward health care which I outlined in my statement of December 10.

Under the provisions of my bill, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare would receive increased authorizations for research and demonstrations relating to health facilities and services. And, he would be required to undertake a systems analysis of the alternative mechanisms which have been suggested as the basis of a national health care program in the United States.

Under the Secretary's supervision a study would be made of each of the major financing mechanisms suggested for a national health care program, such as the tax credit proposal, the modified social security proposal, and the Federal purchase of private health insurance premiums for the poor proposal.

A report would then be made to Congress describing: first, the costs and benefits associated with each financing proposal; second, the changes in the supply of health manpower and methods of health delivery which would be required by implementation of each proposal; third, the number of persons who can be expected to receive an adequate health coverage if a proposed alternative financing and delivery system was to be established; fourth, the legislative and administrative changes required by each alternative system, and fifth, the relative effectiveness and efficiency of each system as compared to the present nonsystem of health care.

In order that the Congress would not be excessively delayed in its consideration of existing national health care proposals and proposals about to be introduced in this session, my bill has a second provision requiring an interim report to the Congress in June of 1971 as to the adequacy and cost of national health insurance bills introduced in the 91st Congress.

Mr. President, I propose this systematic procedure for moving toward a national health care program not only because I believe we must be prepared for the inevitable, but because I am doubtful whether we can transform the country's present $60 billion nonsystem of health care through the traditional patchwork response mechanisms of the executive branch and the Congress.

The usual response of the executive branch and the Congress to national crisis situations is a Presidential recommendation proposing a legislative panacea which is subsequently enacted by the Congress, and is eventually found to be, years later in highly publicized hearings, not adequate to resolve that which was a more complicated problem than what it first appeared to be. The hearings on medicaid might be an example of that process.

The inadequacy of this response mechanism is often complicated by the fact that there is rarely a congressional legislative committee which has complete jurisdiction over all relevant aspects of a problem.

For example, if we examine the method by which the Senate considers just one element of the health nonsystem, the hospital, we find that the Labor and Public Welfare Committee has held hearings on hospitals to authorize money for their construction, the Finance Committee has held hearings on hospitals regarding their reimbursement formulas under Medicare, the Judiciary Committee has held hearings on hospital costs to examine antitrust implications, the Joint Economic Committee has held hearings on hospital costs to analyze their impact on the economy, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee has held hearings on hospital costs to analyze their impact on the economy, the Post Office and Civil Service Committee has considered hospital costs in terms of their impact on Federal employee health plans, and the Government Operations Committee has considered hospitals in the context of the 23 Federal agencies concerned with health.

A reform of our country's nonsystem of health care is going to demand a more coordinated approach than the fragmental consideration we have given the problems of hospitals. It is going to demand more than the traditional crisis inspired Presidential message and legislative band aids. The transformation of $60 billion segment of the economy will require a new process of national change. It will require a systematic, step by step approach. It will call for a new type of executive-legislative relationship.

The Congress cannot legislate in an informational vacuum. We must have all the facts. We must be made aware of all alternatives that are available to us. We must be informed as to the ramifications of the enactment of each alternative available to us. I do not ask the executive branch to support a national health plan, I only ask that Congress be informed of the options available to it.

We cannot afford to be limited in our perspectives on social change by the blinders of committee jurisdiction and the limits of the information provided by the executive in sole support of administration legislation. If the report I call for is properly developed, the Congress will be able not only to debate the merits of a national health program in a rational manner, but it will enable the various committees of Congress concerned with health to legislate with a wider perspective in a harmonious manner proper to each committee's jurisdiction.

The legislation I propose today is not only to be considered as a major step toward a truly comprehensive national health care system, but also as a first step in a redefinition of the role of the Congress in relation to the executive branch as a modern mechanism of social and economic change.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following my remarks the text of my bill, my dialog with the U.S. Surgeon General, Dr. Jesse Steinfeld, the Business Week editorial and special report on medical care, the report of the Library of Congress Legislative Reference Service on the financing aspects of national health insurance proposals, and my RECORD statement of December 10, 1969, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and material will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3634) to amend the Public Health Service Act to provide for the conduct of a systems analysis of alternative national health care plans, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. PELL, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3634

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Health Care Systems Study Research and Demonstrations Act of 1970".

SEC. 2. (a)(1) Section 304(a) of the Public Health Service Act is amended—

(A) by inserting "(1)" immediately after "Sec. 304. (a)";

(B) by redesignating clauses (1) and (2) as clauses (A) and (B), respectively; and

(C) by redesignating clauses (A), (B), and (C) as clauses (i), (ii), and (iii), respectively. (2) Section 304(b) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "(b)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(2)"; and

(B) by striking out "this section" each place it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "this subsection".

(3) Section 304(c) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "(c)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(3)"; and

(B) by striking out "this section" each place it appears therein and inserting in lieu thereof "this subsection".

(b) Section 304 of such Act is further amended by adding after the provision thereof redesignated as paragraph (3) by subsection (a)(3)(A) of this setcion the following new subsection:

"Systems Analysis of Alternative National Health Care Plans

"(b)(1)(A) The Secretary shall develop, through utilization of the systems analysis method, two or more alternative plans for health care systems designed adequately to meet the health needs of the American people. For purposes of the preceding sentence the systems analysis method means the analytical method by which alternative means of obtaining a desired result or goal is associated with the costs and benefits involved.

"(B) When the Secretary has completed the development of the alternative plans referred to in subparagraph (A), he shall submit to the Congress not later than 18 months from the date of enactment of this Act a report which shall describe each plan so developed in terms of—

"(i) the number of people who would be covered under the plan;

"(ii) the kind and type of health care which would be covered under the plan;

"(iii) the cost involved in carrying out the plan and how such costs would be financed;

"(iv) the number of additional physicians and other health care personnel and the number and type of health care facilities needed to enable the plan to become fully effective;

"(v) the new and improved methods, if any, of delivery of health care services which would be developed in order to effectuate the plan;

"(vi) the accessibility of the benefits of such plan to various socio-economic classes of persons;

"(vii) the relative effectiveness and efficiency of such plan as compared to existing means of financing and delivering health care; and

"(viii) the legislative, administrative, and other actions which would be necessary to implement the plan.

"(C) In order to assure that the advice and services of experts in the various fields concerned will be obtained in the alternative plans authorized by this paragraph and that the purposes of this paragraph will fully be carried out—

"(i) the Secretary shall utilize, whenever appropriate, personnel from the various agencies, bureaus, and other departmental subdivisions of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare;

"(ii) the Secretary is authorized, with the consent of the head of the Department or agency involved, to utilize the personnel and other resources of other Departments and agencies of the Federal Government; and

"(iii) the Secretary is authorized to consult with appropriate State or local public agencies, private organizations and individuals.

"Cost and Coverage Report on Existing Legislative Proposals

"(2)(A) The Secretary shall, in accordance with this paragraph, conduct a study of each legislative proposal which is introduced in the Senate or the House of Representatives during the 91st Congress, and which undertakes to establish a national health insurance plan or similar plan designed to meet the needs for health insurance or for health services of all or the overwhelming majority of the people of the United States.

"(B) In conducting such study with respect to each such legislative proposal, the Secretary shall evaluate and analyze such proposal with a view to determining—

"(i) the costs of carrying out the proposal; and

"(ii) the adequacy of the proposal in terms of (I) the portion of the population covered by the proposal, (II) the type health care provided, paid for, or insured against under the proposal, (III) whether, and if so, to what extent, the proposal provides for the development of new and improved methods for the delivery of health care and services.

"(C) Not later than June 15, 1971, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress a report on each legislative proposal which he has been directed to study under this paragraph, together with an analysis and evaluation of such proposal."

(c) Subsection (d) of section 304 of such Act is hereby redesignated as subsection (c) and is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated for payment of grants or under contracts under subsection (a), and for purposes of carrying out the provisions of subsection (b), $84,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1971 (of which not less than $4,000,000 shall be available only for purposes of carrying out the provisions of subsection (b)), $85,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1972, $90,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1973, $95,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1974, and $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975; except that, for any fiscal year ending after June 30, 1970, such portions of such sums available for payment of grants or under contracts under subsection (a) as the Secretary may determine, but not exceeding 1 per centum thereof, shall be available to the Secretary for evaluation (directly or by grants or contracts) of the program authorized by subsection (a).

"(2) In addition to the funds authorized to be appropriated under paragraph (1) to carry out the provisions of subsection (b) there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out such provisions for each fiscal year such sums as may be necessary."

SEC. 2. The amendments made by subsection (c) of section 2 of this Act shall be effective only with respect to fiscal years ending after June 30, 1970.

The material, presented by Mr. PELL, is as follows:

DIALOG BETWEEN SENATOR PELL AND DR. JESSE STEINFELD, U.S. SURGEON GENERAL

Senator PELL. Do you agree that the United States should implement a national health insurance plan in the early 1970's?

SURGEON GENERAL. The Federal Government has moved more and more into health research, health education, and provision of health services through financing mechanisms. In the latter situation, the Federal Government in partnership with those citizens over 65 in the instance of medicare and in partnership with the States in terms of medicaid is actively in the field of financing the provision of health services. Unfortunately, medicaid is not a resounding success since it is primarily a purchaser of services. The problem in this country is to improve both the quality and quantity of health care and to make it available for all who need health care. What I believe we must do immediately is to undertake a number of experiments and pilot projects involving the use of para-professional personnel as well as professional personnel with emphasis on preventive care or preventive medicine and use of ambulatory care facilities in lieu of institutional or hospital type facilities wherever possible. It seems to me, speaking as an individual, that we are moving toward a national health insurance program and it is our duty to be ready for it in terms of not only the capacity to provide the services but in terms of the administrative mechanisms to have an efficient program. I feel, therefore, that it is imperative for us to begin both such experiments and pilot programs as soon as possible.

Senator PELL. Since the poor have shown by government statistics to be least able to pay for the health care that they need, do you agree that the Federal Government should pay the premium for the poor as part of a national health insurance plan?

SURGEON GENERAL. There are two aspects to this question, Senator, as I interpret it. First and foremost, the goal really should be to eliminate poverty, to eliminate the ghetto, and in that situation then all our citizens will be able to afford either health care or the premium for health care or their share of the premiums for health care depending upon the type of program that the Congress and the people choose. However, that is a long-range solution. For the short-range, it is clear that the Government must help provide medical care for the poor through whatever mechanism is most efficient and most appropriate to get the job done in a fair or equitable way.

Senator PELL. Would you favor a national health insurance plan based on a plan similar to Social Security or a plan similar to the one Governor Rockefeller suggested where third party vendors, such as Blue Cross, would be paid through employer-employee work place contributions?

SURGEON GENERAL. Here again, Senator, I think we must do pilot studies in different parts of the country such as urban areas, rural areas, suburban low, middle or upper income areas, and in what has been called the American ghetto, and have our decisions then be based upon our experience as to which of these programs fits our needs. It may well be that in different States or in different areas we will have modifications of a health insurance program rather than a single national plan.

Senator PELL. Do you agree that all the government's 23 health programs should be organized under one federal official?

SURGEON GENERAL. Here I believe that there could and should be far more coordination and cooperation among these several programs and coordination and cooperation with States, local government, and the large number of private organizations and groups involved in health programs. As a step in this direction for the Federal programs alone it might be desirable to set up a coordinating mechanism with a single agency as the lead agency, once again, to learn from this what the problems are, what can be accomplished, and whether our overall effort would be helped or hindered if we were to move in such a direction.

Senator PELL. What types of incentives could be utilized to encourage physicians and hospitals to lower costs?

SURGEON GENERAL. Regarding hospital costs, it must be remembered that hospitals are a recent institutional development in the sense that we utilize them for delivery of children, for intensive care, myocardiac infarctions, operation on diseases as appendicitis, all of which result hopefully in cure of the patient. Not too long ago hospitals were places where people went to spend their last remaining days and it was not usual for the patient to return home able to function in society. In that not too distant past hospitals were charitable institutions run by religious organizations and staffed by dedicated individuals who were paid little or nothing beyond room and board. Accordingly, hospital wage scales have been appallingly low. As the hospital is looked upon more and more as any other business enterprise, wage scales, which make up the great bulk of hospital costs, have risen.

Another important feature, and there are many others I won't mention, but another important feature is the increasing complexity and expense of instrumentation, as for example the monitoring equipment in a coronary intensive care unit.

To lower hospital costs might mean having different types of rates for patients who required different levels of complexity of hospital care. We might, as an incentive, provide higher fees for diagnostic medical work done on an outpatient rather than an inpatient basis. Some of our programs which provide payment only when the patient is hospitalized encourage the physician to hospitalize the patient for diagnostic work which could be accomplished with the patient in a non-hospitalized status.

Another form of experimentation would be prepayment of fees for an entire group of patients paid to a group of physicians who have access to and the use of a hospital as well as outpatient facilities. This might encourage more preventive medicine or preventive care. Such prepayment plans have not been utilized in any of this country's governmental health programs. At this point I am not proposing that this be done on a national basis but I do feel that here, too, experimental or pilot programs should be undertaken promptly to see if we can lower costs while maintaining or even improving the present quality of care.

Senator PELL. Do you agree that no federal money should be spent in any region unless that money is spent in conformance with a comprehensive regional health plan?

SURGEON GENERAL. For health research and health education—no. For health services, this may be desirable if it is truly a comprehensive regional health plan but, as you indicated earlier, when you mentioned that the government has at least 23 health programs, it may be difficult to enforce such a ruling directed presumably at the civilian population if other governmental facilities as DoD or VA facilities are present in a particular region.

Senator PELL. What steps should be taken to encourage a greater emphasis on preventive care services, such as neighborhood health centers, in the United States?

SURGEON GENERAL. All of our programs should emphasize preventive care much more than we now do. This will involve education not only of our school age population but in industrial concerns, in all work situations, and hopefully of housewives as well. It may require the addition of new courses in medical school curricula, and in many or all paramedical educational institutions. We may even need a new type of professional but it seems to me that not only should our professionals be stimulated in this regard but our financing devices such as medicare and medicaid should be remoulded so as to emphasize and to reward those who can utilize preventive medicine rather than the much more expensive hospitalization approach.

REFORM IN HEALTH CARE

Sometime within the next few years, Congress will have to set up a comprehensive national health program for the U.S. Experts on medical care differ violently on many things, but they agree almost to a man that the nation cannot struggle along indefinitely without a complete overhaul of its present patchwork system.

As things stand now, the federal government underwrites medical care for the aged and gives some assistance to state programs for the indigent. The rest of the population is either covered by private insurance or not covered at all. Some 61-million Americans under the age of 65 have no insurance covering in-hospital medical expenses, and 102-million have no coverage for office visits to doctors.

The infusion of federal money has not been enough to provide first-class medical care for all citizens, but it has been enough to give a violent inflationary kick to the whole structure of medical costs. The U.S. now spends more than $60.3 billion a year for health services. This is a higher proportion of gross national product (6.7%) than any other country puts into health care, but the results do not show it. Judged by such key indexes as average length of life and infant mortality, the U.S. lags well behind Western Europe, Canada, Australia, and Japan.

To upgrade its standards of health care as well as to get full value for the money it is spending, the U.S. obviously must overhaul its system. On the financial side, it needs an adequate system of insurance covering the great majority of the population against medical expenses. With this should go some system of keeping doctors' fees within reasonable limits and incentives for efficient hospital management.

There is no hope for transferring bodily to the U.S. the system worked out in some other country. Any workable program must be home grown and developed on the foundations of the present system. This means it must be worked out in a cooperative effort by the U.S. medical profession, the insurance carriers, and the government.

The question no longer is whether the U.S. is to have a national health program. It is whether we shall have a good one or a bad one. The chances of getting a good one will be far better if everyone involved accepts that fact.

[From Business Week, Jan. 17, 1970]

THE $60 BILLION CRISIS OVER MEDICAL CARE

A lot of Americans would rather die than get seriously sick. For millions, going to the hospital means going broke or close to it. For many more, good medical care is nonexistent.

Private health insurance plans, with a large measure of business support, have helped to ease the pains in recent years. So have medicare and medicaid. But pressure is mounting for far more sweeping changes in the way Americans get their medical care, and the answer looks more and more like the one adopted by practically every other major Western country: a national health program.

Many people still regard medicare and medicaid as incipient socialized medicine. They haven't seen anything yet. Before the end of this decade, the federal government will almost certainly get deeply into the health insurance business by sponsoring a program that will cover everyone in the country.

BEYOND BAND-AIDS

Washington is already in up to its knees with medical aid for the aged, the veterans, and some of the poor. But a growing body of opinion holds that this just is not enough, that medicare and state medicaid have been, at best, rather badly administered first aid—Band-Aids and tourniquets, when what is needed is major surgery and more intravenous feedings of that magic medicine, money, but under careful supervision.

The clamor for some kind of national health plan is already drowning out the shouts against "socialism," and it has been heard on Capitol Hill. Perhaps as early as 1971, Congress will start formulating a national health care program.

A flurry of bills is being prepared already (page 64) and even the American Medical Assn., although still staunchly opposed to broad federal intervention in medicine, supports one. None of the drafts spells out in fine detail just how a national health scheme would work, but their very number is evidence that a sweeping change is coming in the way the nation's doctors and hospitals operate.

Two things underlie the impending changes: skyrocketing medical costs and a spreading realization that the U.S. medical system is not delivering the goods. Ironically, this is not for want of trying.

The total health bill for Americans now stands at some $60.3-billion a year. This comes to 6.7% of the gross national product, a greater proportion of national resources than any other country puts into health care. The national bill per person for medical goods and services is up to $293, more than double what it was a decade ago, and is still rising. Since 1966 the cost of health care has been climbing at an average annual rate of 7%, well above the rates of increase in other consumer prices.

For all this, the U.S. has been slipping behind other nations in the key indexes of national health. In infant mortality we now rank 14th, behind many Western European countries. Men live longer in 17 other countries; women live longer in 10.

Quality gap. Few dispute the U.S. medical research in most fields is the world's most advanced and that many U.S. hospitals are among the world's best equipped. But the fruits of this research are not getting out to the great bulk of the population.

IN SEARCH OF A CURE FOR ECONOMIC CHAOS

It is true that national health statistics reflect more than just the quality of medical care. Social, economic, cultural, and environmental factors play a part, too. Americans may drink more, smoke more, or work harder than many Europeans, for instance. And it is obvious that the poor health conditions of millions of blacks who have lived on Southern farms or in Northern slums over the last 20 years have put a drag on U.S. health indicators.

Lately, though, economists have combed through the statistics and come up with some surprising findings. One study shows that in 49 of the 50 states the infant mortality rate among whites alone is higher than the highest provincial rate in Sweden. Says Dr. George A. Silver, a former deputy assistant secretary of the Health, Education & Welfare Dept.: "Sweden spends only 5% of its GNP on health services and gets in return better medical care, lower infant mortality, longer life expectancy, and has fewer people dying in the productive years of their lives."

MISSING ELEMENT

Clearly, something is lacking in the U.S. health care system. One thing that every other industrialized country has that the U.S. lacks is some form of national health program or insurance that can deliver adequate care to the bulk of its people. Such plans cannot guarantee better medical care than the U.S. now provides. They cannot, in themselves, put the brakes on health care inflation. Nor can they ensure that poor rural areas or big-city ghettos get an adequate supply of doctors. But numerous medical experts do maintain that the plans can, and often do, set the base for a broader and more efficient allocation of a nation's health care resources.

Ironically, the first U.S. steps toward a national health insurance scheme—the medicare and medicaid programs—have helped a lot to fuel the wild inflation in medical care costs. How it all happened is a complex story that goes back to the end of World War II. That was when costs of medical care first began to outpace the gains in personal income and the general cost of living. At the time, the impact of the rise was softened for many Americans by the spectacular growth of private health insurance plans.

By the early 1960s, though, it was all too clear that at least two big groups were left without protection against the upward sweep of costs: the poor and the elderly. Both are victims of high rates of disease and disability, the poor because of bad nutrition and bad housing, the elderly because illness almost inevitably accompanies old age. So, in 1966, the federal government moved in with medicare for the aged and began helping the states set up their medicaid programs for the poor.

Skyrocket effect.—In theory, these programs were not supposed to boost inflation. In the past, hospitals and doctors had treated poor patients at little or no cost and had covered the losses by charging others a bit more. Thus, when federal and state aid programs began picking up the tab for charity patients, the charges to regular patients were supposed, at least, to rise less rapidly than before.

Instead, charges to everyone skyrocketed. Since the beginning of 1966, doctors' fees have jumped by 29% and hospital charges by 59%. And the trend may be getting steeper.

One part of the problem is that medicare went into operation just when hospitals faced, and could not hold off, demands for sharp wage increases from newly militant employees. That multiplied costs quickly because labor accounts for some 60% of a hospital's costs. Part of the jump also came because new demands were put on limited supplies of medical manpower and facilities. But many economists believe that the major cause of the sudden and sharp inflation was that the new health programs poured in massive amounts of money without any meaningful controls over expenditures or any attempt to build more efficiency into the health care system.

"Blank checks." Says Rashi Fein, Harvard Medical School professor of medical economics: "The government went into the business of signing blank checks. It gave hospitals cost-plus contracts—and costs rose. It paid doctors on the basis of their customary fees—and their fees rose."

Fein and others point out that the lack of controls was part of the price that had to be paid to get the medicare bill through Congress; AMA lobbyists would probably have succeeded in beating it back if it had involved more than a minimum of government intervention. But once the law was passed, many doctors and hospitals not surprisingly reacted by seeking as much of the government money as possible.

Today, the cost of health care has moved so high that other groups are starting to demand the kind of broad protection that medicare gives to the elderly. With daily hospital charges just for room and board in New York City and Boston running as high as $110, even the relatively affluent can have their savings and homes wiped out by the cost of a catastrophic or chronic illness. While the more generous major-medical insurance plans will pay up to a maximum $15,000 or $20,000, a patient under intensive care in a big-city hospital for as long as a month could well get a bill that exceeds that amount.

Left out. Wide gaps in private health insurance are showing up, too. Some 24-million Americans under 65 have no health insurance at all; 61-million have no coverage for in-hospital medical expenses, 102-million have no insurance to help pay for doctors' office visits.

Private insurers admit that they cannot fill these gaps. Many, such as New York's Blue Cross, are having trouble maintaining present coverage, much less expanding it. So now. Blue Cross, some insurance companies, and some state governments are backing the idea of a federally supported national health insurance scheme to supplement private insurance programs.

With all the support for national health insurance, however, even its advocates have one big worry. The treatment might be disastrously worse than the illness if not administered properly.

Martin Feldstein, professor of economics at Harvard, warns that unless vigorous controls are built into a national health scheme, inflation will eat up any benefits the program might produce. If national health insurance is to achieve its promise of providing adequate health care for all, most medical economists agree, the way in which the U.S. now delivers medical care has to be changed to make it more rational and efficient.

"What we have now," says Rashi Fein of Harvard, "is a highly disorganized, wasteful delivery non-system." While Fein wonders whether any major change will be politically feasible in initial health insurance legislation, he finds it "inconceivable that the government and taxpayers would continue to tolerate" the present system.

Victor Fuchs, vice-president for research at the National Bureau of Economic Research and a specialist in medical economics, says one source of the present system's inefficiency is the medical profession's faulty notion of how it really operates. For ages, doctors have said that so long as patients have free choice of physicians, unhampered by bureaucratic government control, medicine gets all the advantages of a free-market system: The profit motive and open competition will guarantee efficiency, a proper price and rate of output, and a fair return. If demand outstrips supply, prices will rise for a while, but then new suppliers will enter the market.

But medicine, Fuchs points out, is organized on radically different lines: Most hospitals are not run for profit and have little direct incentive to be efficient; doctors do not compete on price; the number of new doctors turned out by the medical schools is tightly restricted; and until recently the AMA has steadfastly resisted expanding these schools.

Another hole in the free-market theory: Consumers of medical services are generally not able to judge their quality or necessity, or to question the price. Insurance plans shield the consumer and make it less likely that he will protest fee hikes. And third parties, such as Blue Cross and insurance companies, have tended to reflect the interests of the providers of medical services, rather than those of the buying public.

BAD ECONOMICS

Most people would not accuse medical men of being bad businessmen: Median income for doctors in the U.S. rose from $28,380 a year in 1964 to around $40,000 last year. But the fierce independence of doctors, hospitals, and medical schools has long blocked all but a minor degree of cooperation, and has been self-defeating in broader economic terms. One result, critics charge, is that much of the money poured into training medical men and equipping hospitals goes to waste through duplication and inefficient use.

This is the root problem that a national health plan will have to solve if it is going to work. Fortunately, doctors themselves have already pointed the way by recognizing the economies of scale. Over the last two decades, they have fostered a strong trend toward group practice. Groups share the cost of offices, nurses, and secretaries, and bring a range of specialties together in one place. Group doctors not only see more patients—as many as 15% to 25% more—but also have more free time to keep up with the latest research in their fields. Patients benefit by dealing with doctors who keep up to date and have better equipment than the individual practitioner.

Group practice reaches its present peak in such programs as New York's Health Insurance Plan (HIP) and California's Kaiser Permanente group. These, says Harry Becker, professor of community medicine at Albert Einstein College of Medicine, are the most promising forms of group medicine. Subscribers pay a flat annual fee; the doctors work for salaries paid by the group, not for fees from the patients. It is the closest U.S. medicine has come to the ancient Chinese notion that you pay the doctor to keep you well, and nothing if you get sick.

Kaiser and HIP may, indeed, best point up the value of group practice for preventive medicine. Kaiser and HIP, says Becker, can give far broader care, for about the same cost, than the more limited health insurance plans. Their record also shows that they can reduce the need for hospitalization by at least 30%, because doctors have no economic reason to hospitalize patients, and subscribers get preventive care.

Both HIP and Kaiser have grown enormously over the 20 years since they were founded, and their efficiency has won lavish praise from outside experts. But they have had very few imitators. The main growth in group practice has come from doctors who still charge patients for each service performed.

The need to scale up for the sake of economy is even more glaring when it comes to hospitals, says medical economist Anne R. Somers of Princeton University. Most community hospitals, she notes, are independent empires that plan their services and by costly facilities with little consideration of what the hospital up the road might be doing. Duplication and inefficiencies abound. It is not unusual for neighboring hospitals to install precisely the same expensive open heart surgery equipment and cobalt radiation units when one facility could easily do.

"Division of labor," Economist Fuchs finds a similar problem in medical practice, through failure to adapt to the enormous technological changes of recent years. "There would be a greater chance of controlling costs if there was a rational division of labor in the profession," he says. At least some of the routine work handled by most physicians today could be taken over by less highly trained people.

The trend to wider use of para-professionals is already apparent. At the Kaiser clinics, for example, batteries of tests are handled by technicians working with computers, not by doctors. The physicians go to work when anything abnormal shows up.

Even in more traditional aspects of a doctor's work, there is room for better division of labor, Fuchs says. A pediatrician, for example, spends 30% of his time caring for healthy children. In Sweden and the Netherlands, specially trained nurse-midwives—not obstetricians—handle most of the work of prenatal care and delivery of babies.

In the U.S., a few medical schools are starting to turn out a new breed of paramedical personnel with responsibilities halfway between those of doctors and those of nurses, but so far fewer than 100 have been graduated.

The high price of hospital care could also be cut if there were more halfway houses between the hospital and the doctor's office. Some experts estimate that up to 30% of hospital patients could be treated in out-patient clinics or extended-care centers, if there were enough of these facilities. Medicare has helped spur substantial growth in nursing homes in the last few years, and this, economists believe, represents a step in the right direction.

The future. Becker of Einstein College thinks these trends point the way to the future shape of the U.S. medical system. "In a coherent and efficient system," he says, "the country would be divided into regional medical service areas. At the center of each area, there would be a large teaching hospital affiliated with medical schools. Around these would be local hospitals, local clinics, group practices, and solo practitioners. And plugged into the system would be nursing homes, extended-care centers, and home visitation services.'

Such a system will not evolve overnight, say the experts. It will have to be based on the voluntary participation of doctors and hospitals, and be flexible enough to tolerate competing ways of providing health care, depending on local needs and desires. A national health plan can help bring it about. "National health insurance is no panacea," says Rashi Fein. "But properly powerful incentives for creative innovation."

A BROAD SPECTRUM OF HEALTH PROGRAMS

When Congress does get around to considering what to do about the country's medical care system, it will find that quite a few high-powered people have been seriously thinking about the problems for quite some time. Schemes for changing the system have already been drafted, some calling for minimal alteration, others going a great deal further (page 64).

Not surprisingly, the Committee for National Health Insurance has worked up the plan that calls for the most sweeping changes. Its ideas are embodied in what is called, in short form, the Reuther Plan—named for the committee's chairman, Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers. Reuther and his UAW have long been among the most fervent critics of present methods of health insurance and the system of health care.

But CNHI is a lot more than a group of labor activists. Its members run from Texas heart surgeon Michael E. DeBakey, to Whitney Young, Jr., director of the Urban League, to retired General James M. Gavin, chairman of Arthur D. Little, Inc.

Federal funding. Reuther and his allies want their plan to provide virtually every kind of medical care for virtually everyone in the country. They would finance it by getting two-thirds of the money needed from Social Security payroll taxes and one-third from general federal revenues. They would put the whole operation in charge of a special office in the Health, Education & Welfare Dept., and this office would also swallow up many of the present federally backed medical programs: medicare, medicaid, and services for civilian dependents of servicemen. There would be ways of controlling costs and controlling the quality of medical care.

Out of this, the committee members maintain, would come a whole rationalization and redistribution of medical care. The gist of their argument is that the present practice of handling health care protection as if it were casualty insurance produces policies that focus on covering the costs of expensive illnesses, the kind best treated in hospitals.

Aetna cluster. Aetna's plan is "a cluster of coordinated programs," says vice president Daniel W. Pettengill. "Aetna, the nation's largest commercial carrier of health insurance, has tried to combine the flexibility of the private sector with the economic capacity of the public sector.' The plan, according to Pettengill, is not simply a different means for financing medical costs, but also "seeks to solve the fundamental problem—the availability of quality medical care. Any plan that does one without the other will simply deepen the country's medical problems."

Aetna is now trying to whip up support for its plan among other insurance companies. Its chances of success are fairly good because the plan proposes that the insurance carriers retain a considerable role: Employee group insurance plans, among other things, would continue to provide some coverage for a large part of the nation's work force. Several large and important areas are left blank in the Aetna Plan, however, and it is unlikely that they will be filled in until there has been more public debate over the issue.

Even bigger blank spaces exist in the scheme proposed by Senator Jacob K. Javits, but this is not likely to be the result of poor homework by the New York Republican. For 20-odd years, Javits has been among the chief advocates in Congress of the need for the reshaping of the medical care system. His key adviser on health insurance is Wilbur D. Cohen, former HEW Secretary and the man who shepherded medicare through the Congress. Cohen probably knows more than anyone else about dealing with the special interest groups in health care.

AMA prescription. The only major plan yet in the form of a bill is the American Medical Assn.'s proposal. Sponsored in Congress by Representative Richard H. Fulton (D-Tenn.) and Senator Paul Jones Fannin (R-Ariz.), it calls largely for a sliding scale of income tax credits for the purchase of private health insurance. It deals only with the cost of insurance; it provides no control over what the insurance would buy.

Most observers consider this bill a delaying action and rate its chances for passage as low. For one thing, it would have to get through the House Ways & Means Committee, whose chairman, Wilbur D. Mills (D-Ark.), frowns on federal programs financed through tax credits. For another, even groups that disagree passionately on just how to control the cost and quality of health care do agree that there must be some form of controls.

Aside from these four main plans, many other more fragmentary proposals are beginning to bubble up in Congress. And at HEW, Secretary Finch has studies going on the problems of financing medical care. Say the activists of CNHI: "Reforming the medical system is an idea whose time has come."

THE BATTLE MOVES TO CAPITOL HILL

"I'll bet you that national health insurance will be a plank in both political party platforms in 1972." That forecast comes from one of the professional staffers of the Committee for National Health Insurance and, naturally, reflects a high degree of self-interest. But as Congress begins to stir itself on the subject, the prediction seems increasingly likely to come true. In fact, CNHI's first target is to get craft legislation introduced in the first half of this year.

From that point on, the country will be in for a good deal of public education on the deficiencies of the present medical care system, and Congress will be the national classroom.

Nobody expects a national health insurance law to be enacted this year. But there is a chance that first steps will come in time for the 1972 elections. The timing depends on a variety of factors: Most important, by general consent, are the rate of future medical cost increases, the makeup of future Congresses, and the relative power of the AMA, currently considered to be one of the strongest lobbies in Washington. The most telling of these will probably be the rate of increase of medical costs.

Washington gossip has it that the small group of legislators who fought steadily for medicare decided not to jeopardize passage of the bill by holding out for stiff cost controls. They had wanted them originally, but later they decided that loose controls might be a disguised blessing. They reasoned that physicians and hospitals would take advantage of the new flow of medicare money to raise costs so high that comprehensive national health insurance would become a necessity.

If that was the strategy, it may well have proven effective. For today, as medical care costs go spiraling on, many health care experts are thinking along the same lines when they predict that a national plan will become law "sooner than you expect."

RESTRAINT

But this time, experts say, Congress will not be so permissive about cost and quality controls as it was on medicare. How long it takes for Congress to decide just what these controls should be and how they should be applied will, they believe, depend a great deal on what is happening to medical costs while the fight goes on.

For the present, backers of a national health insurance plan are doing their best to avoid public disputes over what details the plan might contain. They are trying to generate wide support for the general notion of a national plan and to spike the notion that such schemes would represent "socialized medicine." At the same time, they are spreading the word that medical care in the U.S. is nowhere near as good as it should be.

They appear to be having some success. Says Mike Gorman, executive director of the National Committee Against Mental Illness and a staunch advocate of national health care: "I'm getting invitations to talk on national health insurance from state medical associations that would have hanged me a couple of years ago if I turned up at one of their meetings."

Senate push. To build up a base in Congress, CNHI has already recruited three senators—Ralph W. Yarborough of Texas, John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky, and Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. Kennedy gave the campaign a push a month ago with two proposals. He suggested that Congress adopt legislation this year that would provide complete health coverage for all infants and school-age children, and that it go on from there in each succeeding year to extend coverage to the next 10-year age group. Yarborough, chairman of the Senate committee on labor and public welfare, intends to hold public hearings on the various health insurance proposals sometime this year.

But the group has yet to pull in a member from the House, and it is through the House—and specifically the Ways & Means Committee—that any health insurance legislation must pass.

Ways & Means Chairman Mills has no plans just now to hold health insurance hearings. But he is committed to write new welfare legislation and to look again into the financing of medicare this year. Backers of a national plan see this as a good chance to get in an opening wedge.

THE WAY IT WORKS IN OTHER LANDS

If the U.S. decides to relinquish its special status as the only major Western nation that has no state-assisted national health care plan for the great bulk of its citizens, it will be looking abroad at the ways in which others have handled the health care problem. And judging by what others have done these are some of the lessons to be learned.

No fancy theoretical scheme can be imposed on a country. The plan must evolve from whatever health care structure is already there.

Every scheme that others have tried has serious imperfections. All are very difficult to manage.

Attempts to set up these schemes produce an enormous amount of bickering, but after a while both doctors and the public give it solid backing. London's Dr. M. R. Salkind, former secretary of Britain's General Practitioners' Assn., sums it up: "We must have national health. Private health is just too expensive."

Canada's national scheme may well be closest to any national plan that is likely to emerge in the U.S. The Canadian scheme started operating on July 1, 1968, but it was designed to include the country's 10 provincial governments. So far, seven of the 10 have joined. The big breakthrough came last Oct. 1 when Ontario finally signed up. It is Ontario that is most industrialized, most populous, and most like the U.S.

In Ontario, a battle had raged over the role that private insurance companies would play in the scheme. The fighting ended in a peace pact between public and private insurance interests. Under the pact, 31 private insurance companies were grouped in a nonprofit agency called Healthco to act as administrators of the plan. Healthco handles the bulk of the paperwork in return for about 7% of the premiums paid by Ontario's citizens.

COSTS

In Canada, medical costs are lower than in the U.S. But they are comparable. Under the scheme, a family that pays $14.75 a month is covered for doctor visits, surgery, and various diagnostic and lab tests. For another $11.80 under a separate plan, the family gets coverage for hospital ward costs, ambulance needs, physiotherapy, and other care. The companies in Healthco are still free to sell insurance for items not covered by the basic plan, and the market is strong.

The Canadian scheme rests primarily on the provincial governments. But an average of 50% of the cost will be paid by the federal government—more for the poorer provinces, less for the richer ones. To participate, each province's health plan must cover at least 90% of its population, include a wide range of services, and be run by a nonprofit agency.

Ontario's Health Dept. reports that, since Oct. 1, it has been paying out more than $1-million in claims daily. It estimates total claims for the first year will be about $415-million. With administrative and other expenses, total outlays should be $508-million. To finance the plan, Ontario will get $168-million from Ottawa, $309-million in premiums, and the balance from its own government.

The scheme pays doctors 90% of their fees, which are set by their own medical association. Under old private-insurance schemes, the 90% rule had always held good. But now that the entire population is involved, trade unions and other groups are agitating for 100% payment. Meanwhile, doctors try to collect the unpaid 10% from patients, generating some confusion and ill will.

Her Majesty's. In Britain, the National Health Service also generates wrangling among doctors, patients, and health authorities. But the trouble dates back before 1948, the year the health service was set up. Long before that, British medicine had split into three different establishments:

General practitioners, who perform 90% of all medical care but are barred from treating their patients in hospitals.

Hospitals, now old and rundown, which are staffed by high-paid specialists, low-paid juniors, and badly paid nurses.

Local health authorities, county and municipal groups, which run clinics, child welfare, and ambulance services.

British GPs work basically for salaries paid by the health service. Only 20% of them earn income from private practice, too. Eight years ago, thousands of them protested bitterly over their salary levels and threatened to resign from the health service. But since then the rates have been changed. GPs now rank fifth among British salaried professionals, though their salaries are still low by U.S. doctors' standards.

The bitterest rift over pay is in British hospitals. There, specialists who win consulting posts can pull in up to $25,000 a year, plus extra money from private practice. But there is a limit of 10,000 on the number of specialists who may be employed in the hospitals. Other doctors, just as fully qualified, may wait half their working lives for a consultant's spot to open up while drawing a top salary of just $6,900 a year.

About 600 British doctors emigrate every year, many of them simply because of frustration over pay. And only about 2,000 new doctors graduate from British medical schools each year. Supply and demand would have gotten hopelessly out of whack years ago, and the National Health Service would probably have broken down, were it not for the 2,000-odd doctors who migrate to Britain each year, mostly from Commonwealth nations.

Even so, one of the hallmarks of the service is constant delay. For health service patients, the waiting time for minor surgery can run to months, even to a year or more.

This is where private health insurance goes to work in Brtain. A private patient who is ready to pay is assigned to a different waiting list. He gets one of a fixed number of hospital beds set aside for paying patients. Or he may choose to enter a privately owned clinic.

So, company-paid health insurance is now the mark of executive status in Britain. Some 9,000 companies buy these policies to make sure that their hopitalized executives gets immediate admission, private rooms, telephones, and TV sets. About 2-million Britons hold private policies today compared with just 86,000 when the national system was set up in 1948.

The largest health insurance company in Britain is the British United Provident Association, whose 1969 income was some $36-million, mostly from group coverage. A typical family premium is $105 a year.

Northern lights. When Sweden set up its national health plan in 1955, it did not encounter the condemnation by doctors that the British and Canadian plans met when they were started. Some 70% of Swedes were already in various voluntary health insurance schemes and, for doctors, the change largely meant switching from one set of forms to another.

But Sweden's plan, too, has run into problems. There are long waiting lists for surgery, long lineups at clinics, complaints of impersonal treatment at big-city hospitals.

At the root of the Swedish troubles is a worldwide problem: the shortage of medical staff. In some Swedish provinces, hospitals have to close in the summer for staff vacations.

Paperwork is the second bane of the Swedish system. But the government may have an answer. Starting July 1, each patient will pay a fee of $1.50 to $2 each time he makes a routine visit to a doctor, hospital, or clinic. Few administrative papers will be filled out for such visits, and the saving in red tape should make the whole system less costly.

BUSINESS PONDERS A NATIONAL HEALTH PLAN

Anyone who thinks the soaring cost of medical care hurts only the consumer should think again. Most corporations that sponsor health plans for their employees are finding them an increasing burden. Business has a sizable stake in health insurance, if only because it is a costly fringe benefit that companies pay to millions of workers.

At New York Telephone Co., for example, workers and their families are covered by Blue Cross, Blue Shield, and an insurance plan for major medical expenses. In three years the total bill has leaped from $12.2-million in 1967 to an estimated $18.1-million for the benefit year ending this May. Part of the rise comes from increases in the 92,000-man work force, but costs per employee have jumped 27%.

For New York Telephone, the percentage rise has been even steeper. In 1967, the company paid about half the total bill; this year, it will begin shouldering the entire cost of the package. Says Frederic Schawe, general personnel supervisor: "We are very concerned about the inflation in medical costs."

National plan. Thus, New York Telephone has an "open mind" about a national health insurance plan. And this attitude seems to be shared by other companies. Out of 100 businessmen queried by Business Week, however, only a few were ready to go on the line.

"If what I've been reading about health care in this country today is true, then standing up against a national health plan would be like arguing against God and motherhood," says Gordon R. Scott, Fisher Scientific Co.'s vice-president for personnel administration. "My snap opinion is that a national plan would involve constantly escalating costs. But more important, a national plan would take away an item worth up to a cent an hour that you can now stack on the bargaining table."

Says G. I. Rifendifer, personnel director at Duquesne Light Co.: "I'd be against a national health insurance plan. . . . I think the union, too, would resist losing the benefit they've bargained for. If the government took it away, they'd bargain for a replacement."

Opinions. Medicare's inflationary record has made many others cool to the idea of a wider national plan. Says a West Coast personnel director: "Everything I've seen happen with that program leads me to believe that a national plan would be one great disaster."

But not all comments are negative. A personnel chief at a Midwest utility says: "I was very skeptical about medicare, but now that it's here I see it works, so I hate to be overly skeptical about a national plan. . . . Besides, I'm not happy with our present private health insurance plan—it's going up 7% a year."

Few of those who were ready to talk backed a federal plan. But some did say that the present system of care and insurance needs reform.

"The whole point is to hold down costs," says a Denver personnel man. "If the present plans can't do it, enactment of a national plan is a sure bet."

FOUR ROADS TO NATIONAL HEALTH INSURANCE

These are the plans now being formulated for presentation to Congress.

Reuther plan

Coverage: Almost everything for almost everyone.

Financing: Social Security taxes and general federal revenues.

Cost control: Rates for medical services to be set locally within guidelines set by Health, Education & Welfare Dept. and outside experts.

Quality control: Guidelines from HEW. Financial incentives for team practice, regional coordination of medical facilities, community health centers, continued medical education. Annual reports from boards representing consumers.

Role of insurance companies: Possibly as fiscal intermediaries; possibly no role.

Aetna plan

Coverage: Poor and uninsurable persons covered by insurance company pool for federally-determined benefits. Catastrophic illness coverage for everyone for costs exceeding state-determined amounts. Employer coverage of part-time, temporary, disabled, and laid-off workers encouraged by income tax credits.

Financing: Federal and state funds plus small payments from low-income patients for federally-determined benefits. Federal grants to medical schools for family care specialties and federal loans for community health care centers.

Cost control: Hospital review committees, physician review committees, local agencies would authorize charges for institutions such as nursing homes on basis of past performance.

Quality control: Same groups as above.

Role of insurance companies: Unchanged.

Javits plan

Coverage: Extension of Medicare to all under 65, in effect paying for 80% of average man's medical costs, 100% for those now under Medicaid.

Financing: Social Security taxes and general federal revenues. Federal grants for construction of family-care clinics, expanded outpatient departments and other ambulatory care facilities.

Cost control: Undecided.

Quality control: Undecided.

Role of insurance companies: Unchanged for uncovered 20% of average man's health costs. Fiscal intermediaries in government program.

AMA plan

Coverage: Everyone.

Financing: Income tax credits for purchase of private health insurance, ranging from 100% credit, worth $400 for family with adjusted gross income of under $5,000, to 25% credit, worth $100 to family with $10,000 or more. Medical care vouchers for purchase of private health insurance for persons now under Medicaid.

Cost control: Unchanged.

Quality control: Unchanged.

Role of insurance companies: Unchanged.

Subject: Financing aspects of various national health insurance proposals.

This is in reply to a request received from Mr. McKenna of your staff asking the Legislative Reference Service for information regarding the financing mechanisms applicable to the various proposals for national health insurance programs and for the other alternative proposals. The proposals we were asked to review in connection with their financing aspects are the following: the proposal of the Committee for National Health Insurance (the "Reuther Plan"), H.R. 15779 introduced by Rep. Martha Griffiths, the Rockefeller-Javits proposal, H.R. 24 introduced by Rep. John Dingell, the American Medical Association proposal for "Medicredit," H.R. 9835 introduced by Rep. Richard Fulton, the AFL–CIO plan, and the proposal discussed by Rep. Durward Hall. In addition we have included information pertaining to the financing arrangements used to underwrite the costs of the British National Health Service. The financing mechanism proposed for each of these plans is discussed below.

Due to the limitations of time set by your staff, we are presenting here only a brief statement of the methods of financing suggested under the various plans. We hope to be able to expand in depth upon specific considerations arising in regard to these financing mechanisms at some time in the future.

I. The Reuther proposal formulated by the Committee for National Health Insurance (CNHI)

The Committee for National Health Insurance, founded in November 1968 by Mr. Walter Reuther, President of the UAW, and other interested national organizations, has been actively promoting the idea of a national health insurance program to be created as an integral part of the national social insurance system of Social Security (OASDHI).

Tentatively, the plan assumes that ⅔ of the resources needed to finance the program would be derived from "payroll" taxes contributed by employers, employees, and self-employed persons, with the remaining ⅓ coming from general Federal tax revenues. State and local governments would not be required to participate in financing the national health insurance program. The financing mechanism suggested by the CNHI is, in its view, "total, adequate, equitable, and assured" and would, therefore, require no deductibles, coinsurance, or other forms of financial participation by insured persons.

Outlined on October 14, 1969, the "Reuther Plan" would continue to permit employers to assume all or part of the employees' portion of contribution for health insurance purposes. Under this program, funds from appropriate government agencies would be allocated for those special population groups (the poor and marginally employed) who are not covered through the employers/employees financing mechanism. Thus, Medicaid or other special programs of medical assistance for the needy would not be necessary, since health services would be available to all Americans. Medicare for the aged would be integrated into the new program.

II. The Griffiths' Bill (H.R. 15779)

On February 9, 1970, Representative Martha W. Griffiths of Michigan introduced into Congress H.R. 15779, designed to provide a program of national health insurance. The benefits that would become available under the proposed bill would be financed through a "Health Services Fund," created on the books of the Treasury Department to receive contributions from employers, employees, and the Federal government.

Under the Griffiths bill, employers would contribute to the national health insurance program an amount equal to 3% of earnings subject to social security taxes. Employees would provide an amount equal to 1% of covered earnings. The Federal Government would match employers' contributions (3%) by allocating funds from general tax revenues. An additional provision of the bill calls for a cost-sharing, or services co-payment, by recipients of medical services. Certain co-payment amounts would be charged to insured individuals utilizing certain health services. Such co-payment, however, could not exceed $50 per individual, or $100 per family in any calendar year. State and local governments would be relieved of health service tax burdens. The bill would eliminate Medicare and Medicaid. Money currently supporting these programs would become available for the national health insurance.

III. Rockefeller-Javits proposal

Governor Nelson Rockefeller has again presented to the New York State legislature his proposal for compulsory health insurance to be financed through an employer-employee-government mechanism. Senator Jacob Javits of New York has indicated he will soon present his own proposals for a nation-wide universal health insurance program which observers believe will incorporate most of the provisions of the Governor's plan.

Under the Rockefeller-Javits proposals, a program of contributory health insurance would be financed through the combined contributions of the employer and employees not to exceed 4% of the employer's annual payroll. Employee contributions are not to exceed 2% of wages or one half the cost of providing coverage, whichever is the lesser amount. The categories of the unemployed, those on public assistance, and those eligible for medical assistance under existing programs such as Medicaid would have their health insurance purchased for them. Rockefeller's plan would involve State financial participation only in connection with the aforementioned categories of people. Senator Javits' proposal calls for premiums for insurance policies for the poor, medically indigent, and certain unemployed to be paid from a "pool" fund made up of Federal and State contributions.

IV. Dingell bill

Representative John D. Dingell of Michigan has offered various legislative proposals calling for the establishment of a universal health insurance program. The most recent "Dingell Bill" (H.R. 24), introduced on January 1, 1969, proposed a contributory prepaid insurance program using financing mechanisms similar to those used in the social security program. Representative Dingell recommended that a separate "Personal Health Services Account" be created within the Treasury Department to absorb the necessary funds appropriated to carry out the provisions of a health insurance program.

Sums appropriated to the Account would amount to 4% of state wages. Sums derived from all Federal revenues equal to 3% annual wages estimated to be received during any fiscal year would be deposited in this account. The Account would also be supplied with additional sums equal to the estimated cost of furnishing dental care and home nursing services to beneficiaries, in amounts ranging from ½ of 1% to 1% of all wages. (Any further amounts required to carry out the act are also authorized.) An amount equal to 1% of estimated annual wages would be appropriated and used to establish a reserve for emergency purposes, such as special demands arising in epidemics, disasters, etc.

Since the bill purports to be a health measure rather than a tax measure, the exact methods of financing were not specified in Dingell's proposal. However, the bill is drafted in such a way that it seems to indicate the revenues would come, in the main, from payroll taxes.

V. The AMA proposal—"Medicredit"

Speaking before a meeting of the House Committee on Ways and Means, Russell B. Roth, MD, indicated on November 3, 1969, that the American Medical Association would like to see the Federal Government help defray the costs of voluntary private health insurance through a system of graduated income tax credits. The AMA plan would provide for cash incentives in the form of tax credits based on an individual's Federal income tax liability. Eligibility for tax credits would be limited to those persons whose tax liability was under $1,000. Tax credits would be graduated on a sliding scale in amounts ranging from 10% to 100% of the cost of the annual health insurance policy premium. In such a plan, the lower the tax liability, the higher the tax credit.

Individuals in the lowest income levels with little or no tax liability would receive "medical care vouchers" or certificates enabling them to purchase insurance from qualified groups or plans. Medicaid would, therefore, become unnecessary and would be eliminated under this program. However, since the AMA plan is specifically designed for individuals under 65 years of age, Medicare would not be replaced and would remain as is.

VI. The Fulton bill

A plan similar to the AMA "Medicredit" was introduced into Congress on April 2, 1969, by Representative Richard H. Fulton of Tennessee. The Fulton bill, H.R. 9835, is identical to a later proposal sponsored before the Senate by Senator Paul J. Fannin (S. 2705) on July 28, 1969. Like the AMA plan, the Fulton bill concerns itself only with the provision of tax credits for the financing of private voluntary health insurance and does not have the intention of changing the actual delivery system of medical care benefits, as do the Reuther and AFL–CIO proposals.

However, the Fulton bill differs from "Medicredit" in the following ways:

(1) a system of graduated tax credits would be based on adjusted gross income rather than on tax liability.

(2) there would be no ceiling on eligibility for tax credits—individuals at all income levels would be allowed a certain tax credit ranging from 100% credit for families whose income was under $5,000 to a 25% credit for families with an income of $10,000 or more.

(3) the maximum amount of credit available under this plan is specified as $400 for families filing joint returns, $200 for husbands and wives filing separately, and $150 for single persons without dependents.

(4) there is no age limit on participation in the plan—those 65 and over could use the tax credits to pay for Medicare premiums.

(5) the Fulton plan specified that if an individual accepts a tax credit, no medical deductions on the standard income tax form would be allowed.

The Fulton bill incorporates the AMA proposal providing for the Federal issuance and financing of medical care vouchers for those individuals whose tax return shows no tax liability or whose liability is less than the specified tax credit.

VII. The AFL–CIO plan

The AFL–CIO plan appears to be essentially an expansion and extension of the Medicare program. It would include all persons and would be financed through payroll taxes but with support also from the Federal Government. Tentatively, the employer would pay ⅓ of the cost, the employee would pay another third, and the balance would be financed by the Federal Government from its general revenues.

VIII. The proposal of Rep. Durward Hall

Another suggestion regarding the implementation of a national health insurance plan has been put forth by Congressman Durward Hall of Missouri. Representative Hall divides his proposal into two parts—the first, to replace Medicaid; the second, to be implemented at a later, unspecified, date. Under the plan, the lower income group, Title 19 Medicaid recipients, would receive voluntary health insurance coverage for approximately 85% of their health care costs. The balance of health care expenses would be picked up by the States. The second part would cover catastrophic illness and would apply when the family's health care costs exceed a certain percentage of the family income. The financing of both programs would be from general revenues. As far as we know, this proposal has not as yet been detailed in full, and is a resume taken from speeches, news releases, etc.

IX. The British National Health Service

Enacted in 1946 as a comprehensive program of health and medical benefits to all Britons, the National Health Service is financed through exchequer funds (general revenues), rates and exchequer grants (including interest accrued under National Insurance Funds), National Health Service contributions from individuals, and set fees charged the recipient of certain medical services and such items as eyeglasses, drugs, etc.

According to the latest information provided by the British Embassy in Washington, D.C., exchequer funds provide 72.5% of the cost of the program in England and Wales with the following categories providing the remainder of the cost:

(1) Rates and exchequer grants—12.5%.
(2) NHS contributions—10.75%.
(3) Charges for services—4%.

The remaining .25% is derived from "other" sources.

The National Health Services contributions from individuals are based on a weekly flat rate, to which additional graduated contributions are made by employed persons working for wages or salaries. The additional amounts paid by this class of employed persons are shared, in part, by employers on the basis of an established schedule calling for the employee to assume the bulk of additional charge. Self-employed and non-employed persons pay only the weekly flat-rate contribution and are not charged the additional graduated amounts.

KAY CAVALIER.

OUR NATIONAL NONSYSTEM OF HEALTH CARE—A NEED FOR A NEW STRATEGY

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, in the coming weeks the Senate will be considering the appropriations for the Federal Government's major health programs. In the course of that debate we will be, once again, facing the perplexing question of the inadequacies of health care in a nation which is capable of placing men on the moon, but which is not yet capable of delivering adequate health services to its citizens.

I do not believe we will be able to find those answers that will assure us that increased health appropriations will resolve our Nation's crisis unless we consider the significance of those appropriations in the perspective of the changes that need to be made in the methods by which health care is provided to the citizens of this country.

To gain this wide perspective, I believe we must use a systems approach in our analysis of the Nation's health problems.

In order to do this I will first describe what I mean by the term "health care system" and how I would use a systems approach as the means of approaching a solution to our impending health crisis.

The systems approach is a dynamic concept used to describe interrelated organizations or machines which operate together for the purpose of accomplishing common goals. The goal of the health care system of the United States is usually understood by most people to be a long life free of disease and incapacitating or debilitating illness.

Systems theory assumes that there are alternative strategies which can be followed to reach the goals established for the system and that the effectiveness of the various strategies or methods can be analyzed by comparing the output of the system under each strategy. I will first describe what I believe the present health care strategy is, and then I will suggest what I believe is a better alternative strategy.

If the strategy implicit in the operation of our present day health care system were analyzed, it would be described as an unconscious hospital-oriented strategy based on the premise that health care is a marketable item, that is, the level of health care an individual may receive in great part depends on the amount of money he can spend. The premise is rooted in a laissez-faire concept of medical care which predicated the doctor as an individual economic unit who determines his level of income by the level of demand for his services.

I describe the present strategy as hospital-oriented because the hospital is considered the heart of our health care system. In the mind of the average man, the hospital is the only place where health care takes place. It is the only place where a doctor can provide health care and it is where private and government insurance plans are most likely to provide the largest reimbursement.

I describe the present strategy as unconscious because it is not the result of any conscious decision by any representative body to provide health care in such a manner. Since our present health care system is rooted in a laissez-faire concept of medical care, the collective decision-making necessary for the rational planning of our health care system has not been possible until recent years. Consequently, our present health care strategy is the result of the interrelationships of various ad hoc decisions made by many different groups in the fields of health, insurance, finance, and government. Our present strategy has resulted in a nonsystem of health care.

To implement this unconscious hospital-oriented strategy, the United States now spends more money than any other country in the world for health care, 6.5 percent of the gross national product in 1968. Of the $53 billion spent in 1968, private sources contributed 63 percent, the Federal Government spent 24 percent and the State and local governments expended 13 percent.

From the Federal level, there are three main fiscal inputs into our national health care system which are funneled through 23 separate Federal agencies. First, there is the development of health resources for which the Federal Government spent $2.8 billion in 1968, second, there is the provision of hospital and medical services for which the Federal Government spent $10.8 billion in 1968, and third, there is the prevention and control of health problems for which the Federal Government spent $565 million in 1968.

Having described the present health care stratgy and the costs of implementing that strategy, I would now like to outline the results of that strategy and those expenditures, what is known in system terms as the outputs of our health care system.

There is no doubt that the level of health care in the United States, for those of us who can afford it, is the highest and best in the world. Our doctors are highly trained and are among the world's best.

Yet, our Nation, also the first in expenditures for health, ranks 14th among nations in terms of infant mortality and 16th among countries in terms of life expectancy. Between 1958 and 1966, the expectation of a healthy life at age 65 increased only by a scant .4 of a year to 13.5 years after the age of 65 in the United States.

In 1963, the last year for those figures, an estimated 6.2 million man-years were lost from the U.S. economy through illness. In 1968, in the health care system there was a shortage of 145,000 nurses, 52,000 physicians and 9,000 dentists in the United States.

Between 1958 and 1966 physicians' fees have risen 38 percent and hospital daily service charges have risen 100 percent. According to the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, medical costs are now rising at more than double the increase in the cost of living. Physicians' fees are now increasing at 6 percent a year. Daily hospital costs which average $70 today are expected to be $100 a day within 3 years.

Besides the low ranking the United States receives according to international health indicators, the impact the present hospital-oriented and market determinative health care system of the United States is even more shocking when nonquantitative reports such as the Kerner Commission report are examined and the relationship of our health crisis to the problems of the cities, of race, and inflation become more evident.

In its analysis of the root causes of civil disturbances, the Kerner Commission said:

"The residents of the racial ghetto are significantly less healthy than most other Americans. They suffer from higher mortality rates, higher incidences of major diseases and lower availability and utilization of medical services."

In its study of the relationship of hunger and income, the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs, of which I am a member, said in its interim report that "clinical validated malnutrition exists in serious proportions in the United States and is a particularly acute problem among infants and pre-school and school children from low-income families. Malnutrition is both a major cause and a common result of ill health." Witnesses before the committee also suggested that there is a correlation between slow learners in school and the incidence of ill health in schoolchildren.

The effect of the present high cost hospital care and income focused strategy of the health care system on its accessibility to the lower middle class and the poor has been strikingly outlined by statistics developed by the Government.

For example, during 1963 and 1964, while 54 percent of children under 17 years of age in families whose income was in excess of $10,000 had at least one general physical examination, only 16 percent of those children under 17 years of age with family incomes of less than $2,000, had such a routine checkup. More than 20 percent of the people in families with incomes under $3,000 have never visited a dentist as compared to 7.2 percent of those in families with incomes of $10,000 who have never visited a dentist.

While to this point I have painted a somewhat depressing picture of the health care system in the United States, this does not mean that I do not believe that improvements cannot be made. I believe progress can be made if the Congress is willing to replace our present nonsystem of health care with a national system of health care based on a new strategy.

I believe we must develop a new strategy of health care capable of providing a floor of basic health care for all our people regardless of income.

Each citizen of this bountiful country should have a right to a minimum standard of health care. Reasonable health care should not be a function of the vicissitudes of the marketplace. It should not be dependent on the socio-economic conditions of the consumer. We must work to abolish the great disparities in the standards of health care that are now evident in the United States.

I believe a new strategy should be considered which emphasizes the preventive aspects of health care rather than the curative aspects of health care. Our present health system provides excellent care for the patient only after he has reached the hospital bed. A hundred dollars a day in a hospital is too expensive a way of providing health care. A strategy should be developed based on diagnostic and neighborhood health centers which allow for the preventive treatment of illness before hospitalization is required. People should be encouraged to have periodic checkups and the medical profession should attempt to find the time needed to provide those checkups.

Unfortunately, the majority of existing private and public health insurance plans do not create an incentive in their plans for preventive care, nor is there adequate medical personnel available to give the level of preventive care needed today. Both Government and private health insurance plans usually pay the largest amount of reimbursement for hospital care rather than ambulatory care.

The experience of the Kaiser plan in California, which provides coverage for adequate preventive care is further evidence of the necessity of following a strategy based on ambulatory care rather than hospital care. The age adjusted utilization rates for Kaiser hospitals have been more than 30 percent below the average for California hospitals and the rise in expenditures for Kaiser hospitals has been considerably below the national average.

The experience of health care plans in two foreign countries also suggest changes which might be considered in our present health strategy. Under the old Chinese system of care, the doctor was not paid for his services unless the patient recovered. While I would not favor implementing such a drastic system, I think a new health care strategy should include some consideration for the development of incentives for doctors to provide quicker, more effective, and less costly health services.

Perhaps the health insurance companies could give doctors a bonus payment for patients who spend less bedridden time than is normal for their particular illness or perhaps the Government could pay doctors to take midcareer courses designed to update them with new discoveries and more effective ways of delivery health care.

The experience of the Australian plan suggests another consideration. In Australia, the costs of catastrophic illnesses are covered by a national plan. In the development of a new health strategy, I would suggest that consideration should be given, not only to the provisions of preventive care, but also to the coverage of the astronomical costs that are incurred as the result of a catastrophic illness or accident.

The final characteristic of the new strategy I suggest would be strong adherence to comprehensive health planning for localities, regions and the Nation. The health care system can no longer be managed as a cottage industry. Allocation of our limited health resources must be made in a rational manner according to where the need exists not where the dollar has the greatest pull. We must have a conscious and a coordinated health care strategy.

The implementation of the national health system's strategy, which I propose will place a heavy burden on the Congress for new legislation. It will require legislation for the following purposes:

First, to provide a health care floor for all Americans. I see no other alternative for the future than a universal health insurance plan for the United States. Such a universal health plan would provide financial coverage for a minimum floor of preventive care such as multiphasic screening. At a maximum it might also provide some form of protection against the high costs of catastrophic illnesses. While there are a number of financing arrangements that could be considered, I would hope that the national insurance plan finally proposed would be paid for by some sort of taxing structure with the Federal Government picking up the health insurance premiums for the very poor. I am not sure whether such a plan would be best administered by the Government like the medicare and medicaid programs or by nonprofit bodies such as Blue Cross, but I believe the Congress should begin in 1970 an investigation into possible alternative national health insurance measures.

For, I do know that, if expensive operations such as organ transplants are to become more widely available, if high-cost medical technology like kidney dialysis machines are going to become available to the people who need them, if a basic level of health care is to become part of the normal expectation of all our citizens—as is the expectation of a basic level of education, and police and fire protection, some form of a national health care system such as I suggest must be developed.

Second, I think greater authority should be given to State, regional, and national planning mechanisms, such as those that were established in Rhode Island and other States under the partnership for health legislation. Where comprehensive health plans have been developed, I believe Federal health funds should be spent only in conformance with those plans. I look to changes in the Federal health facilities construction programs which would not allow Federal expenditures to be made in violation of State comprehensive health plans. I look to changes in the hospital and long-term care facilities reimbursement formulas under the medicare and the medicaid programs which would prevent reimbursements to health facilities not in conformance with State plans. I hope that these are changes that both the Finance Committee and the Labor and Public Welfare Committee will consider.

Third, I believe a greater effort must be made to increase the supply of health manpower. This requires us to fully fund the health manpower programs.

Money to increase our country's supply of health manpower is in no way an inflationary pressure. As a matter of fact, by reducing the gap between the supply and demand for health manpower, expenditures for health manpower programs provide a deflationary pressure in the long run.

The development of health manpower requires many years of education. Our failure to act this year to reduce the health manpower shortage will make it even more difficult to fill that gap in future years. There are few other investments for which the Federal dollar can receive a greater return than health manpower programs. If we are to have a universal health coverage in the future, we must make the investments today to provide the manpower needed to operate such a system.

Fourth, a national health system means that steps will have to be taken to coordinate the Federal Government's 23 health programs under one Federal official and establish a Council of Health Advisers, similar to the Council of Economic Advisers, as Senator RIBICOFF has ably suggested.

I am hopeful that the actions we take on the health appropriations bill and on the many extensions of health authorizations which will be required in the coming year will represent the initial consideration of the new health strategy I propose.

While I realize that the changes I suggest will demand many hours of work by the Congress, I believe that the seriousness of our national health crisis justifies such actions.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Bartlett, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 15628. An act to amend the Foreign Military Sales Act;

H.R. 15998. An act to authorize the disposal of Surinam-type metallurgical grade bauxite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16289. An act to authorize the disposal of natural Ceylon amorphous lump graphite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16290. An act to authorize the disposal of refractory grade chromite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16291. An act to authorize the disposal of chrysotile asbestos from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16292. An act to authorize the disposal of corundum from the national stockpile;

H.R. 16295. An act to authorize the disposal of natural grade manganese ore from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile; and

H.R. 16297. An act to authorize the disposal of molybdenum from the national stockpile.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2593) to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to facilitate the entry of certain nonimmigrants into the United States, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED OR PLACED ON THE CALENDAR

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred or placed on the calendar, as indicated:

H.R. 15628. An act to amend the Foreign Military Sales Act; to the committee on Foreign Relations.

H.R. 15998. An act to authorize the disposal of Surinam-type metallurgical grade bauxite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16289. An act to authorize the disposal of natural Ceylon amorphous lump graphite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16290. An act to authorize the disposal of refractory grade chromite from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16291. An act to authorize the disposal of chrysotile asbestos from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile;

H.R. 16292. An act to authorize the disposal of corundum from the national stockpile;

H.R. 16295. An act to authorize the disposal of natural grade manganese ore from the national stockpile and the supplemental stockpile; and

H.R. 16297. An act to authorize the disposal of molybdenum from the national stockpile, placed on the calendar.

THE NEED FOR AN INFORMATIONAL BANK, USING THE SYSTEMS APPROACH

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the previous remarks bring to mind the difficulty we in Congress have in securing specific information and facts when we are considering proposed legislation.

We in the Subcommittee on Education have been caught short several times by not having available, the tables needed, the specific application of a bill as it affects different States, and the general material necessary for the orderly process of legislation.

I have seen this in connection with the conference report we are working on today. For several days, the senior Senator from New York has made the suggestion that we ought to have a State-by-State breakdown, yet the shortage of staff on the Hill, and the unwillingness, or the lack of cooperation from the executive branch, makes it very hard to get the figures.

I would hope that serious consideration would be given by the Committee on Rules and Administration, by Congress, and by the Senate, to the establishment of an information bank of our own, through the use of computers, utilizes to the full the systems approach. If this is done we will no longer be dependent, as we are now, upon the executive branch for information. Information which is usually furnished to us swiftly when it is in support of their objective, but not so quickly or with as much alacrity when it is not in support of their objective.

(At this point Mr. BYRD of Virginia took the chair as Presiding Officer.)

TEXTILE AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on February 10, I reported to the Senate on my recent trip to Japan. My purpose was to put before the Senate my conclusions, after talking to Japanese Government and business leaders, with regard to two areas of greatest importance to both countries: Asian security problems and trade relations. I also made suggestions looking toward a fair and practical solution to a problem which threatens seriously to affect not only our relations with Japan, but also our entire trade and economic posture in the world: The problem of textile imports.

Others have also made highly constructive proposals and in this regard for example, I do not believe that the remarks of the Honorable WILBUR MILLS on January 27, 1969, have been taken nearly seriously enough.

In the month that has now passed, it is clear that negotiations remain at an impasse and that the climate for them has worsened. The American Textile Manufacturers Institute has passed a resolution calling for the breaking off of negotiations and for quotas to be fixed by law. Senator THURMOND has introduced a bill to this effect, appealing for bipartisan support. Trade unions affected by imports have called a 1-day strike. Members of the House of Representatives have notified their Japanese counterparts that they intend to seek a legislative remedy. And, angry words have been exchanged between U.S. officials and officials of the Common Market over this issue.

The public statements of Japanese textile company officials on the other hand, indicate a serious misreading of the U.S. congressional mood.

It is clear that this issue is not only affecting our political and economic relationships with Japan, but also with the European Common Market. This issue will also affect the fate in the Congress of the President's trade bill which will have a profound effect upon our trade relations for years to come; and it will affect, too, the administration's proposal for a generalized preferences scheme with the less-developed countries that has not, as of yet, been sent to the Congress. A solution to the textile problem could contribute immeasurably to more harmonious relations internationally and to the prospects of successful passage of this important legislation at home.

Japanese textile interests should be under no illusion that the U.S. Congress if it becomes convinced of Japanese immovability on this matter, can and probably will pass quota legislation on textiles—whether or not desirable. The American textile industry and the labor unions involved in the manufacture of textile products and apparel, on the other hand, used to be fully cognizant of the difficulty of passing legislation that would offer to the textile industry, alone. We have been warned of a "Christmas tree" of protectionist amendments to the trade bill, and there is certainly evidence of pressure for special protection from other industries which are alleged to be suffering from a similar sudden impact of competition from imports. Such a movement could bring on a trade war and set back the world's economy by decades.

I think my credentials in this entitle me to speak, as I have been on the side of liberal trade for over 20 years, all the time that I have been in public life.

I remain convinced that a mutually satisfactory compromise remains practicable—particularly if the counsel of the "wise men" in the United States and Japan prevails on this issue. And let us not overlook the fact that there are many groups on both sides of the Pacific who today are working for just such a compromise. But I am concerned that their wisdom and counsel may not prevail as hardening of positions continue to be buttressed by the continuing deadlock. Time, in this instance, is not on the side of reason—and a reasonable settlement.

When I reviewed the situation last February 10, I concluded that "as the Japanese have been delinquent in recognizing that trade must be a two-way street where one side should not enjoy a $1 billion-plus surplus, perhaps U.S. negotiators have not sufficiently realized that negotiations to be fruitful must also encompass give and take." More than a month has passed and what has happened since is not encouraging.

I find the Japanese aide memoire of March 9, 1970, unfortunate—the text of the aide memoire is said to have appeared in the Japanese press, and earlier this week parts of it were quoted in a Senate speech. United States and Japan almost as soon as it was delivered. This diplomatic note has caused much disappointment and yes, even chagrin, in the United States. It reportedly is said to contain formidable language declaring that the Government of Japan can implement export restraints solely on a selective basis, for those items which are subject to serious or threat of serious injury caused by increased imports, and upon obtaining the consent of the domestic industries concerned in Japan and also of other major exporting countries. The tone of the reported note leads me to the conclusion that the next move on this complicated chess board now rests with Japan.

I have previously stated that I hold no brief for Japan's rigidity in the fields of nontariff barriers to trade and liberalization of capital investment there. This same rigidity should not carry the day on the textile question. During my visit to Tokyo, I stated clearly that by maintaining such restrictive policies in the nontariff barrier and investment area, Japan was jeopardizing the whole world trading pattern. Today, the stakes in the textile issue are even greater since they involve United States-Japanese political relations as well. If Japan does not move now and make a serious counteroffer, I am concerned that with the passage of time, the chances of a compromise solution will be gravely diminished.

And for those in the United States who are playing the game of all or nothing, it seems clear that Japan will not liberalize if the effort is made to demand only a rigid comprehensive quota system. It also seems clear that the world would read and regard such a step as a shift toward protectionism on the part of the United States. This would strengthen the challenge of protectionism throughout the world—the same challenge shown by those attempting to maintain the common agricultural policy of the European Common Market on its present disruptive course.

The time is now ripe for the responsible political leaders in the United States and Japan who must make the overall determination as to the national interest of their countries, as distinct from regional or special interests, actively to involve themselves in this issue and to make a textile agreement. I call on both governments to avoid perpetuating a meaningless semantic impasse and move to the practical and pragmatic task of hammering out an agreement before our time runs out. The hot line between Japan and Washington should be activated, and it is up to Japan's leadership to make or authorize the next call.

S. 3636—INTRODUCTION OF THE HIGHER EDUCATION OPPORTUNITY ACT OF 1970

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce on behalf of the administration, for myself and the Senator from Colorado (Mr. DOMINICK), the Higher Education Opportunity Act of 1970. This measure is the implementation of the President's message on higher education of March 19, which I had the honor of introducing as the ranking member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

This measure, with authorizations for 5 years, has as a principal objective the reform of the present system of federally financed student aid. As the President indicated in his message:

> No qualified student who wants to go to college should be barred by lack of money.

The bill creates a National Student Loan Association to provide a secondary market for student loan paper from banks and institutions of higher education, thus increasing the accessibility of loans for students.

It recognizes the increased costs of a college education—tuition fees up 16 percent in the past year—by raising the amount of money a student can borrow with a Federal guarantee from $1,500 to $2,500.

It also extends the payback period from 10 to 20 years, without any repayment period.

Under this new student aid program, Federal funds will be concentrated on students from families under $10,000 annual income. A student will now be able to assemble a package of grants and subsidized loans sufficient to give him the educational buying power of a student from a family earning $10,000, thus focusing the available resources of the Federal Government on the students most in need.

Another principal provision of the bill is the establishment of a National Foundation for Higher Education to foster excellence, innovation, and reform. Modeled along the lines of the National Science Foundation and with an authorization of $200 million for its first year, the new Foundation would provide project grants to postsecondary institutions for new quality programs and ideas as well as funding projects in public service education, community service, law school clinical experience, international education, language development and networks for knowledge, all programs presently authorized—but insufficiently funded in the past—without the limitations imposed by narrow categories.

With college costs and enrollments mounting each year and existing resources bending under the strain, it becomes increasingly necessary to utilize new means for educating a greater number of students at reasonable cost while at the same time strengthening the quality of education. This proposal should be explored in this light.

The new foundation could also be helpful in sustaining the Nation's private colleges which are being increasingly pressed by higher costs. As the minority members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare noted in their report on the Higher Education Act of 1968:

> We are particularly concerned also with the future of our Nation's private colleges, now comprising 30% of all enrollment, whose growth is not keeping pace with that of higher education.

The provisions in the tax reform bill recently enacted by the Congress to encourage private donations to colleges and universities shows the congressional recognition of the need for sustaining such institutions which include among them the most illustrious in the Nation and among the most illustrious in the world.

In another principal title of the bill, the proposed career education program, funded at $100 million for its first year, recognizes the importance of community and junior colleges offering less than a 4-year course of study. It also recognizes the need to prepare more young people for meaningful careers in positions requiring postsecondary training but less than 4 years of college. This could be particularly helpful in fields with critical manpower shortages, such as engineering technicians, draftsmen, dental hygienists, occupational therapy assistants, psychiatric aides, practical nurses and medical therapists.

Other titles of the bill deal with developing institutions, college library assistance, interest subsidies for construction of higher education facilities and extension of the Education Professions Development Act, with technical amendments.

I ask unanimous consent that a summary of the major provisions of the bill be printed in the RECORD, and I send the bill to the desk for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of Virginia). The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the summary will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The bill (S. 3636) to extend and amend the Higher Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and Mr. DOMINICK), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

The summary, presented by Mr. JAVITS, is as follows:

SUMMARY OF MAJOR PROVISIONS OF HIGHER EDUCATION OPPORTUNITY ACT OF 1970

TITLE I. NATIONAL FOUNDATION FOR HIGHER EDUCATION

Establishes National Foundation with board and director, appointed by the President.

Authorizes the Foundation to make grants to institutions for innovation, reform, and the encouragement of educational quality.

Authorizes funding of projects in public service education, community service, law school clinical experience, international education, language development, and networks for knowledge, repealing existing authorities for those programs.

Transfers the administration of NDEA Title IV graduate fellowships to the Foundation.

TITLE II. COLLEGE LIBRARY ASSISTANCE

Focuses library assistance on institutions with exceptional need and repeals existing basic grant authority.

TITLE III. DEVELOPING INSTITUTIONS

Extends existing program, with technical amendments.

TITLE IV. STUDENT FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Establishes the National Student Loan Association to provide a secondary market for student loan paper from banks and institutions of higher education.

Removes interest ceiling on subsidized student loans, raises annual maximum loan from $1500 to $2500, and extends maximum repayment period from 10 to 20 years.

Targets Federal grants and subsidized loans on students from families of less than $10,000, providing these students with at least the same ability to pay as a student from a family earning $10,000 a year.

TITLE V. EDUCATION PROFESSIONS DEVELOPMENT

Extends existing program, with technical amendments.

TITLE VI. INTEREST SUBSIDY FOR CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHER EDUCATION FACILITIES

Limits Federal construction support to interest subsidies, repealing existing grant and direct loan authority.

TITLE VII. CAREER EDUCATION

Establishes a program of formula grants to States for additional costs incident to the development of post-secondary programs which provide career training for critically-needed skills.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I am delighted to have the bill introduced, and I am so glad that the senior Senator from New York, who takes such a leading role in the whole field of education, is doing so.

I would hope we could have hearings before long on this subject. As the Senator knows, we have already had 1 day of hearings. I am delighted that the administration has firmed up its thoughts.

I would hope that in any hearings we would particularly focus on the problem posed by the fact that the lowest quarter of the population, economically speaking, furnishes one-seventh of the students, as distinguished from the top quarter.

I am sure these figures do not reflect the borrowing power available and not being utilized in this country.

I am glad to see the administration proposal. I would hope that we could give some serious thought to my idea of working out some means of granting those students aid that they would receive as a matter of right without relationship to any other factor, if they are in good standing in college or wish to be in one, that would be the difference between the income tax the students pay, or their parents pay if they are carried as dependents, based upon $1,200 a year.

By doing that, it would mean that those students who come from poor families and do not have to pay any income taxes at all would receive the full benefit. If they come from that portion of America called middle America, with incomes of perhaps $8,000 or $10,000 a year, and paying taxes of perhaps $5,000 a year, they would receive a grant of $600 or $700.

This could mean the difference between youngsters going to college and not going to college.

I hope that this bill will be given serious consideration as soon as we catch our breath and get through with the primary and secondary education bills.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am very grateful for the statement of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island. I assure him that his views will not be overlooked. I know the President will be grateful to the Senator for the fine spirit of cooperation he has shown in this and any other matter related to education.

The Senator from Rhode Island has given support which is not only bipartisan, but also unpartisan, in its approach to the whole problem of education.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I thank my friend, the Senator from New York, for his comments. I will continue to try to cooperate in this regard.

We have a great need in the Senate for statistical information. I would hope that the executive branch of the Government would be as responsive as possible to giving us the statistical information we need.

It takes too long to get the information at present.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I will do my utmost in that regard. I am very cognizant of the requirements, and I shall join in requesting the information.

I believe the fine attitude the Senator shows generally will help in that regard and will make people work harder than they have to get the information.

Mr. PELL. I understand the statistical section of HEW might be small. It might have to be enlarged, but that is up to the executive branch.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, if they have to be beefed up, I will do my utmost to see that that is done.

MINORITY GROUP EMPLOYEES IN STATE EMPLOYMENT SECURITY AGENCIES

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am pleased to report that the Secretary of Labor has today issued a policy statement which encourages State employment security agencies to hire more minority group employees for their staffs.

General Administration letter No. 1367 establishes this policy to insure that all employment security offices can effectively provide comprehensive manpower services. If the employment security agencies are to successfully fulfill this role in the communities served and with private employers, the agencies must themselves be models of equal employment opportunity.

With the emergence of employability development as a major component of manpower services, it is of primary importance that employment security staff members have an intimate knowledge of the local community and disadvantaged clients whom they serve. The ability to understand clients served is a fundamental qualification for persons employed in these public contact positions.

The Secretary of Labor has stated:

It is the policy of the Manpower Administration that the Employment Security agencies should employ such numbers of workers from minority groups as will assure that all agencies and offices can operate effectively in responding to the manpower and employment needs of the community being served.

I understand from the Department that Federal standards will be published in the near future and all State employment security agencies will be asked to submit detailed plans for:

First, making any necessary changes in agency personnel policies and practices, including job restructuring;

Second, working in cooperation with the merit system agency to assure that their policies and practices insure full equality of opportunity; and Third, dealing with anticipated problems.

The upgrading of current minority staff is an important element of the total effort. In almost all State agencies, minorities are underrepresented in the higher level jobs.

This policy is in accord with legislation which I introduced earlier, the Manpower Training Act. The Manpower Training Act is designed to decentralize and simplify the delivery of manpower training services to the people who most need them. Since strong reliance would be placed upon the State employment security agencies under the Manpower Training Act, the new policy statement will increase the effectiveness of the Nation's manpower training programs.

As one who has fought hard and long for minority opportunities through the establishment of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission and other Federal initiatives, and most recently for opportunities for minorities in the construction trades, I am particularly pleased that the concept of full opportunities for minorities will be implemented in this crucial area, where minority involvement will have a "multiplier" effect, since minorities can best bridge the gap between the "system" and those that have been excluded from it.

I, therefore, congratulate the Secretary of Labor for his enunciation of a policy which must be adopted by the States without reservation if the employment security system is to grow and increase its services to the disadvantaged. Effective response to the manpower and employment needs of the community it serves must be the hallmark of the State Employment Security System.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alabama.

EXTENSION OF PROGRAMS OF ASSISTANCE FOR ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 514) to extend programs of assistance for elementary and secondary education, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, at this time we are considering the conference report of the managers from the two Houses with respect to differences between the two Houses on the matter of the Elementary-Secondary School Amendments Act.

Some 2 or 3 weeks ago we were discussing the Voting Rights Act, and amendments to it, and the junior Senator from Alabama participated to some degree in that discussion. It was pointed out to him, however, that if the debate on the Voting Rights Act was concluded, we would get to the matter of confirming the nomination to the U.S. Supreme Court of Judge G. Harrold Carswell. With that thought in mind, the debate was allowed to be concluded.

We went into executive session and discussed for some days the matter of the confirmation of Judge Carswell.

The junior Senator from Alabama certainly recognizes the eminent fairness and wisdom of the majority leader, and his right to control the flow of legislation in this Chamber, but the Senate was in executive session, and a conference report is a legislative matter. The conference was not a privileged matter, as it would have been, had we been in legislative session. The matter was called up, and has now become the pending business before the Senate.

An effort was made earlier today to obtain the setting of a definite date for voting on the present pending business, the conference report having to do with the Stennis amendment. The junior Senator from Alabama objected to the setting of a time for a vote on the conference report unless it was tied in with an agreement for setting a time for voting on the Carswell nomination. So the junior Senator from Alabama stands ready and willing at any time, including today, to vote on both of these issues, the matter of the conference report on the Stennis amendment—and I think that is probably the best way to identify it—and the matter in executive session of the confirmation of the nomination of Judge Carswell to be an Associate Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court.

The Carswell nomination was under discussion in the Senate when the matter was withdrawn from the Senate and the conference report on the Stennis amendment substituted in lieu thereof. So the junior Senator from Alabama would suggest that it is the opposition to the Carswell nomination that is responsible for the extended discussion that is being carried on at this time.

The junior Senator from Alabama would be happy to agree to, and would be hopeful that, later on in the afternoon, an agreement will be reached, setting a definite date for voting on both of these issues.

I think it might be observed by just a casual glance that the opposition to the Carswell nomination, by and large, with some notable exceptions, are the opponents of the Stennis amendment and as such, of course, are the proponents of the adoption of the conference report.

I believe that later on, before the matter of agreeing to the conference report is voted upon, a motion will be made to send the report back to the conference committee, either with definite instructions or with general instructions, seeking to do a better job, a more effective job, of carrying into effect the expressed wishes of the United States Senate with regard to the Stennis amendment.

The Stennis amendment was adopted by the Senate in a great and all too rare exhibition of statesmanship, when it expressed as being the policy of the United States, in establishing guidelines and criteria for dealing with segregation in the public schools of the United States, that a uniform policy throughout the country would be adopted.

Mr. President, I am unwilling to accept as final a Federal policy, with respect to the public school system of this Nation, that allows or permits or encourages or fosters the existence of segregation in northern public schools and at the same time demands a crash program of desegregation in the public schools of the South.

Mr. President, the Stennis amendment was a short amendment, but it expressed what the Senate felt should be the public policy of this country with respect to the public schools of our Nation. It said that in dealing with the condition of segregation by race, whether de jure or de facto in the schools of the local educational agencies of any State, the guidelines and criteria shall be applied uniformly in all regions of the United States whatever the origin or cause of such segregation.

Why is it necessary for the Congress to declare this policy? For the very simple reason that the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare recognizes two types or styles or conditions of segregation—de jure segregation which they say is segregation that resulted from operation of law or official government action or policy which has been held to be unconstitutional, and de facto segregation, which in many instances is much greater and exists to much greater extent in the big cities of the North than it does in the South. HEW takes the position that the latter is not unconstitutional, and that they are going to have two different policies, one with respect to de jure segregation and another with respect to de facto segregation.

The Stennis amendment merely states, in effect that there will be one uniform policy dealing with segregation—that we are one Nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all, that all peoples in this country are entitled to have the same rule applied with respect to them, and that we are not going to have one rule for the North and another rule for the South.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) stated on the floor of the Senate that he would be willing to abide by any uniform policy that the people of the North would be willing to abide by with respect to segregation and desegregation. Name the policy. Set the policy. Set a policy that sections outside of the South are willing to abide by, and the citizens of the South will accept that policy and observe it.

I was very much interested in some of the debate that took place in connection with the Stennis amendment. There was one distinguished Senator, who is not in the Chamber at the moment, who said, "We could not stand to have a uniform rule. We could not stand to have, in our area, the same policy applied to our schools as is applied to the southern schools." He said, "It would take the whole Army to enforce any such uniform policy in areas outside the South."

So that is the attitude that some adopt, that they could not live under the uniform policy if the policy with respect to de jure segregation were applied in the North with respect to de facto segregation.

Mr. President, another reason that I feel that the matter should go back to conference is to give our managers on the part of the Senate an opportunity to negotiate further with the managers on the part of the House, and see if they cannot come back with a proviso and plan that is more in conformity with the express wishes of the Senate.

Mr. President, the amendment which the conferees tacked on to the Stennis amendment is found in section 2(b) of the report. After defining the policy that shall be uniform throughout the country, the conference report has this amazing proviso:

> Such uniformity refers to one policy applied uniformly to de jure segregation wherever found, and such other policy—
> An entirely different policy—
> as may be provided pursuant to law applied uniformly to de facto segregation wherever found.

So, instead of having one uniform policy throughout the country, the conference report provides for two policies, both of which the conferees say are uniform—one uniform with respect to de jure segregation and the other uniform with respect to de facto segregation.

Mr. President, this provision, section 2(b) in the conference report. What the conferees apparently did was to substitute their language for the language in the bill as it passed the Senate, and the Senate amendment comes out as section 2(a). The language is exactly the Stennis amendment down to that point. But then they added the section 2(b), which changes it 180 degrees, so that instead of having one policy with respect to de jure segregation and the same policy with respect to de facto segregation, they say, "No, we are going to have two uniform policies."

Mr. President, that just belies the very definition of "uniform." The word "uniform" is based on the Latin word for "one." So it implies one policy, a uniform policy. The word "uniform" cannot apply to a splinter policy, one part going all the way North and the other, headed 180 degrees in the opposite direction, for the South.

In other words, the so-called uniform de jure segregation policy would be the policy that is headed toward the South; the so-called uniform de facto segregation policy would be the policy headed toward the North.

That does just exactly the opposite from what the Senate voted that it wanted to do. It wanted a uniform plan for the entire country, a plan that would give equal protection of the law to every citizen, North and South, whatever that policy is. We said, "Figure out whatever policy you want that is in accordance with the Supreme Court decision, but make the policy uniform, apply it North and apply it South." That is all the Stennis amendment seeks to do.

But the conferees, for all their willingness—and I am sure they tried hard, because each and every one of them is an honorable man. Every one of the conferees worked hard, to get the Senate version agreed upon by the House of Representatives. I feel confident that they did. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. PELL), I am sure, worked tirelessly in favor of getting the Senate position adopted. I admire and respect him and have the highest confidence in him. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), I am sure, also worked hard to get the Stennis amendment agreed to, just as the Senate passed it. The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), I am sure, put forth his best efforts to get the Senate version providing for uniformity of application of whatever policy the Federal Government decides upon. I am sure he worked hard on that. I am sorry the distinguished Senator from Minnesota (Mr. MONDALE) is not here, because I wanted to pay particular tribute to his fairness and the objective manner I am sure he used in going into this problem and working with the conferees, and pointing out to them that it would not be proper for the conferees to turn their backs completely on the Senate enactment, and it would not be proper to change, by 180 degrees, the course that the Senate had set. I am sure that they worked hard for the Senate version.

I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON) worked hard. I noted on yesterday that the Senator from Missouri engaged in what the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island referred to as a scenario with him for building up the record on this matter. I am sure that the Senator from Missouri also tried to carry out the will of the Senate in this regard.

I do not see the distinguished Senator from Indiana on this list of conferees. I am wondering how he kept off this list of conferees. He does not seem to be here.

But the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) was one of the conferees, and in all sincerity I do say that I am advised that he did make an impassioned plea for the adoption of the Senate version of the amendment.

Also, I am sure that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) worked hard for the Senate version.

But I believe that our distinguished conferees should be asked to go back and seek an additional audience with the House managers.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. PELL. I really did not catch the full tenor, as I should have, of the Senator's words; but, as the chairman of the Senate conferees, I must take exception to any thought that the Senate conferees did not fight vigorously for the Stennis amendment.

Also, I would remind the Senator that there is more in the bill than this one amendment. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Education, I am proud of this bill as one of the best that I think has come out in a long time.

Speaking with regard to the entire bill and specifically with regard to the Stennis amendment, I think we came back with more bacon than many other conferences.

I recall, incidentally, that the Senator from Mississippi did a great job as chairman of the Senate delegation in the conference with the House on the defense appropriations, when the liberals had various amendments adopted on the Senate side. Senator STENNIS fought hard for those. He brought back about half—a little less, a little more. There never was any question of impugning the vigor with which Senator STENNIS fought.

I am very struck by the fact that those who are basically traditionalists and believe in the system of conferees doing their best for the Senate now question whether these conferees in fact carried out the will of the Senate.

I recall that the one Member of the House conferees, who was most for the Stennis amendment, was particularly struck, and said so in the conference a couple of times, that we in the Senate were fighting for that amendment.

Questioning the vigor with which the Senate conferees pressed is simply not correct. I know that the Senator from Mississippi, who has been in conferences. has not expressed this thought.

When I did not get all I wanted in my gas warfare proposal or one of my disarmament proposals in the conference on the defense bill, and the Senator from Mississippi came back—one thing was dropped, if my recollection is correct, and something else was not—the slightest thought did not go through my mind of either questioning the vigor with which he fought or that I should say, "Let's send it back to conference," or "Maybe one of us should have been on the conference."

When one raises these questions, it goes to one of the fundamental questions in the Senate. If this is the question, and the vigor with which we fought these measures is impugned, then, I think that whenever measures are handled by other committees and we feel the conferees are not in sympathy with them and voted against them and we doubt their vigor, we should say that those who voted for the amendment should be on the conference. I think this would set a whole new premise in the Senate, and I am not sure it would be correct.

I can assure the Senator that we fought vigorously.

Mr. ALLEN. I will say to the distinguished Senator that I said nothing to the contrary. I said that the distinguished Senator did fight hard for the amendment.

Mr. PELL. Every Senator in the conference did. This is my point.

Mr. ALLEN. I was naming them when the Senator interrupted. I certainly meant to cast no reflection on the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island for his efforts in the matter. All that the junior Senator from Alabama was suggesting was that it might be possible to go back to conference, have the matter recommitted to conference, and to point out to the members of the House Conference Committee team that this conference report does not comply with the expressed wishes and views of the Senate after it debated for several weeks with regard to this very proposal.

Mr. PELL. It is absolutely the prerogative of the Senate to send us back. I have told the Senator from Mississippi that if we are sent back with instructions, we are sent back with instructions. But I do think that that approach is a different approach. But if the approach is at all on the basis that the battle was not fought vigorously, then I think we are opening up a Pandora's box.

I know that the Senator from Mississippi recalls the defense bill to which I referred. I do not think that one of the so-called liberals ever criticized him in the slightest for not coming back with a whole barrel of pork—just the opposite, we were trying to cut the pork—for coming back with less than we passed. Naturally, if we had again brought the thing to a vote and had said, "Go back with instructions," the Senator would have gone back with instructions.

I have noticed in the last couple of days of this debate that several times quite an issue has been made of who the conferees are and who has approved and who has not. If this is the case and if this is one of the lines of argument here, then I, as one Senator, want to serve notice, if this is valid, that whenever an amendment is agreed to and Senators who are conferees did not agree to it, we who have agreed to it in the Senate have a right to be on the conference; and I do not really think that is the case.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I want to state at this point that I assure the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island that I intended no reflection on the distinguished Senator.

Mr. PELL. I realize that.

Mr. ALLEN. I was merely suggesting that if the matter is re-referred to the conference, it could be pointed out that this does not comply with the wishes of the Senate.

Mr. PELL. If the Senator will forgive me, he mentioned his curiosity that the Senator from Indiana was not on the conference.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. PELL. The reason for that is that he was not on the committee. The other Senators were on the committee.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. I thank the Senator for yielding. I asked him to yield at this point because the Senator from Rhode Island referred to a bill we had in the Senate last year, of which I was floor manager, and we went to conference. He had two very constructive amendments and suggestions. He handled them well on the floor, and we did the best we could for them in conference. I appreciate his remarks.

I can see, too, that this is a big bill, and it is a sensitive subject—if I may use a mild term. I can see that debate would build up somewhat in the mind of one who was handling the bill, after all the struggle and the endless days. I have had the same experience.

But so far as the Senator from Alabama is concerned, I say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I have been sitting here all the time, and my interpretation is that the remarks of the Senator from Alabama were quite complimentary to the conferees. He called the Senator from Rhode Island by name, to start with, and paid special compliment to the Senator. During part of the time, the Senator from Rhode Island had to be out of the Chamber. I have heard all that the Senator from Alabama has said.

I thought it was complimentary. I took the allusion to the Senator from Indiana to be a kind of jest. The Senator from Indiana has a sense of humor about him that we like. I know that I do. I thought that was done in jest. But, I say, this debate has been rugged at times. We have talked about a 180 degree angle. But I do not believe anyone impugns the motives of Senators. I say that because I have a feeling about this thing, I think, from the standpoint of the Senator from Rhode Island. I have appreciated every word the Senator from Alabama said. I alluded yesterday briefly to the fact that the House conferees, being vigorous for their position, just waited it out. They are a very skillful group of people, as we all know. I believe that the tone of the debate was complimentary to the conferees.

I thank both Senators from Rhode Island and Alabama for yielding to me.

(At this point Mr. CRANSTON took the chair as Presiding Officer.)

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, another reason why I feel it would be well to send this measure back to conference is that at the time the conference report was drafted and returned to the respective Houses, the message of the President of the United States dealing with the subject of segregation and desegregation had not been made public.

It occurs to the Senator from Alabama that the conferees might take this message from the President, which he states is going to be the policy of the executive department with respect to the matter of desegregation. Possibly, it would be in order, or it would be capable of being accomplished, that some of the ideas and thoughts advanced by the President of the United States might be incorporated in the amendemnt proposed by the conference committee.

That is another reason, in the judgment of the Senator from Alabama, why it would be well for the conference report to be recommitted to the conference committee for the purpose of considering its actions, in light of the message from the President of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I would like to point out, and I would like to have the comments of the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island after I have made this suggestion, that I see a serious danger in subsection (b) of getting the Federal public school policy and the actions of the school boards resulting from it in such a state so that there will be no integration at all in this country. I feel that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would not like to see that take place.

Subsection (b) provides for a uniform policy with respect to de jure segregation, and a uniform policy with respect to de facto segregation.

As the President pointed out, and as we all were aware, the Supreme Court has not ruled de facto segregation to be unconstitutional.

Now to apply, then, the present policy in this Nation to the segregation as it exists outside the South which, by and large, is held to be de facto, that would foster that type of segregation and it would be protected. If the application of the de jure policy, one of demanding immediate desegregation, if the segregated systems—if there be any—if they should all comply with the desegregation mandate of the Supreme Court, and comply to such an extent that there were no more segregated systems in the country, all systems outside of the South having desegregated—of course, we still have segregation in the North—but the desegregated school systems in the South, if they would then resegregate as a result of changing neighborhood patterns, so that we would have segregation again in the South, this time protected by the de facto rule—this uniform de facto rule, provided by the amendment—we then would have de facto segregation all over the country and no integration. I do not believe that the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island would like to see that take place.

Mr. PELL. The Senator is absolutely correct. I would not like to see it take place, although from a legal viewpoint, while I might not like to see it happen, it could well happen under either section (b) to which the Senator referred in the conference report, or under some of the statements in the President's message to Congress on school integration that was sent up yesterday.

In this connection, section (b) of the conference reported Stennis amendment is similar in concept to what the President said in his message. This is the reason, I would imagine, why some thought was given to the idea, with the President's message in mind, that perhaps one way to resolve the problem we are here discussing would be the elimination of the whole provision. For the President, has moved directly along the lines of the Senate's wishes.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I would point out to the distinguished Senator that even if the provision is to be eliminated, the only way that could be done would be to send it back to conference. So that he would have to vote to send it back to conference before he could get it eliminated. The Senator either has to take the conference report, including the whole bill, or send it back.

Mr. PELL. That is correct. When, in the conference, suggestion was made that it be eliminated, the Senate's wishes were obviously not to do so. We sought to retain the amendment and while the clothing we dressed it in may not be pleasing to the parents of the child, we do feel that the child itself is the same. The President's message is very much along this line. Both the President and the conference sought to accept the fact that, for the time being, the courts have made a distinction between de jure and de facto segregation. I hope the day will come when there is no difference, but the applicable law does recognize a difference due to the cause of each. I do not mean that there is an analogy here. I am not a lawyer; but I am reminded of the fact that, if a man is killed, the law recognizes there is a difference between manslaughter which is accidental, and murder which is when it is intentional. De facto is the same. The man is dead.

And I would say in this discussion that, although segregation exists in two types, either way it is wrong. However, for the moment, the courts which do guide us have ruled that one is more wrong than the other, just as murder is a felony and manslaughter can be a misdemeanor.

The day may soon come when both kinds of segregation are declared to be equally wrong. In the meantime, the President has accepted the present view in his message.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the amendment the committee added does put a shelter or an umbrella around or over de facto segregation as it exists in the North, does it not?

Mr. PELL. It does. And as the Senator pointed out, if de facto segregation develops in the South from living patterns, the growth of suburbia, and things of that sort, both the President's message and the bill as it came from the conference would permit it to exist.

The Senator from Alabama asked me earlier if I would like to have that happen. The answer is "No."

Mr. ALLEN. Would it be better to have a Federal school policy that is seeking desegregation of both types of segregation rather than to have creeping de facto segregation eating in on the de jure segregation with the possibility that segregation will again be the order for the entire Nation?

Mr. PELL. That would be correct. Nevertheless a statement of policy is not law. And the Stennis amendment is in the form of a statement of policy. The basic law has to be changed or interpreted by the Supreme Court.

Mr. ALLEN. If that be true, why would the distinguished Senator mind adopting the Stennis amendment as such, if it is not law and it does not mean anything, why not adopt it?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I was opposed to the amendment in the Senate and I supported it in conference. Personally, I think it would have been advisable to have it remain, as adopted because the original policy change signaled by it to the administration was accomplished at the time of passage in February. And I do not think much more signaling was necessary. I think partly as a result of that signaling, we received the President's message.

Mr. ALLEN. It would occur to the Senator from Alabama that possibly the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Alabama are cast in somewhat unfamiliar roles. The Senator from Rhode Island is advocating a policy that would protect segregation. The Senator from Alabama is saying, "Let's apply up North the same desegregation policies that are applied in the South." But the Senator from Rhode Island does not want that.

Mr. PELL. The Senator is absolutely correct. I perhaps sound somewhat inconsistent but we must look to the cause of the condition. In this connection, would the Senator like to sponsor some tightening up of the civil rights legislation? That would be the way to approach the matter.

Mr. ALLEN. We are seeking by the Stennis amendment to provide a uniform system, whereas the Senator from Rhode Island wants de facto segregation to continue in the North but the de jure segregation would be desegregated in the South.

Mr. PELL. It is not that I want to do this.

Mr. ALLEN. That is what the Senator is advocating, whether he wants to do so, or not.

Mr. PELL. I am advocating that different kinds of segregation be handled in the same way, wherever they occur.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, is it segregation that is wrong or is it the means that have been used that result in segregation?

Mr. PELL. Both.

Mr. ALLEN. Is segregation wrong?

Mr. PELL. Absolutely. And the wrong is compounded because of the means.

Mr. ALLEN. Why is the Senator unwilling to do it by means of the Stennis amendment?

Mr. PELL. I sought to do it in the conference.

Mr. ALLEN. But the Senator from Alabama would respectfully point out to the Senator from Rhode Island that the conferees came out with a provision that would protect de facto segregation in the North but attack de jure segregation in the South.

If segregation is wrong, why is it not wrong in the North as well as in the South?

Mr. PELL. I think the Senator is a lawyer and realizes what the amendment does better than I do. It neither protects nor attacks segregation in the North or the South. It simply says that the two kinds of segregation must be treated alike, wherever they occur.

Mr. ALLEN. Not the two kinds, but each separate kind. That is a far cry from the single, uniform rule that is provided by the Stennis amendment.

Mr. PELL. Perhaps, if the Stennis amendment did indeed accomplish that end.

Mr. ALLEN. It surprises the junior Senator from Alabama to find the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island advocating then a policy that does protect and foster segregation in the North when, by his own statement he says that segregation is wrong.

Mr. PELL. I do not advocate any kind of segregation. I am saying that one type is presently permitted by the courts. And that is a fact. When the time comes that it is not protected, I will say hurray. But for the moment, this is the fact.

Mr. ALLEN. The Stennis amendment would apply the same desegregation rule throughout the country, would it not, so that if it is a Federal policy to attack segregation, then would not the Stennis amendment point out that the segregation in the North should be attacked or desegregated?

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the problem is, as the Senator knows, that the Civil Rights Act—I think it is title VI—applies only to de jure segregation. So, if it is all put together, the effect would presumably be that there would be no enforcement at all. We have to interpret the statement of policy in light of what is presently within the terms of reference of the law.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad the Senator mentioned the Civil Rights Act. The junior Senator from Alabama inquired soon after he came to Washington of the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare why it was if the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and if the appropriation bill for the Department of HEW in 1968 provided that funds provided by the appropriation bill should not be used to require busing, the closing of schools, or requiring any child to go to any school not the choice of his parents in order to overcome racial imbalance, this very thing was being done.

The junior Senator from Alabama asked the Secretary, "Why is it in the face of that that your department is getting up plans that it submits to the court to require the busing of students 10, 20, or 30 miles, the closing in my

State of $100 million worth of schools, and the denial of the freedom of choice to students to go to the schools of their choice? Why is it you are doing that in the face of this express provision of law?"

His answer was that those provisions just applied in the case of de facto segregation, that the phrase "racial imbalance" was synonymous with de facto segregation. So, it was found that the provision of law would offer protection to de facto segregation and prevent busing for the purpose of knocking down de facto segregation and prevent the closing of schools to desegregate de facto segregation, and prevent the denial of freedom of choice to knock down de facto segregation.

So we found that HEW was using these two standards. That is one of the first objections the Senator from Alabama has to this phrase; that whereas now HEW is carrying out its policy, it is a policy of protecting de facto segregation and attempting and succeeding by punitive means to do away with de jure segregation. That is the policy of HEW, whereas if the conference report is agreed to as is, it would write into law this dual policy. That is what the Senator from Alabama objects to.

This is far worse than if the conference had thrown out the Stennis amendment because the Stennis amendment provides for uniform policy. The conference report strikes down that uniform policy and sets up two policies that it calls uniform under separate conditions, but it proceeds to write that into law and it will have the force of a legal enactment of Congress; whereas if nothing is done that would be a policy that could be reversed through methods other than repeal of the statute itself.

So it does seem to the junior Senator from Alabama that there is an ample reason for sending the conference report back to conference and let it consider what it wants to do in light of the recommendations of the President.

Now, Mr. President, as I have pointed out in colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, section (b) of section II does have the effect of perpetuating segregation in the North or in areas outside of the South, whereas the Stennis amendment called for one uniform policy dealing with both types of segregation. The Stennis amendment took the position that whether segregation is good or bad, whether it is to be attacked by the Federal Government, whether desegregation is to be sought with respect to segregation, let that decision be a decision that will apply to the entire country and not build up some sort of legal fiction about segregation having resulted from operation of law or statutes calling for a dual system.

There have been no legal dual systems in the country since 1954. Prior to that time a dual system was legal and it was constitutional. As soon as the Brown decision was handed down that ended the legality of the dual system. It also forbade a State from fostering segregation. It knocked down the dual system. We have not had a dual system by law since 1954. I have some interesting figures here.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a series of questions?

Mr. ALLEN. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, the Senator made reference to so-called de jure segregation. He has made reference also to what has been presented by those who are proposing we adopt something that would be a protection for segregation generally outside the South.

Does the Senator know—and I am sure he is familiar with it to a degree—that a great number of these States outside the South are States that for a long time have had laws on their books regarding segregation of the races for their public schools, and some of those statutes required separate schools and others permitted it; and that a great part of their history at the time their communities were growing up shows that they were influenced by those statutes as much as was done in the South? Will the Senator develop that thought? I refer to the State of Indiana and even the State of New York, and a number of States like that.

Mr. ALLEN. I appreciate the Senator's question. During the debate on the Stennis amendment the junior Senator from Alabama had printed in the RECORD a list of States which at one time had had a statute providing for the dual system and these States were some 44 or 45 in number. So nearly all of the States outside the South did have the statutes and, of course, if the Supreme Court took the position that there never could be erased the harmful effect of a statute, then the segregation that exists in those States should also be de jure segregation.

Mr. STENNIS. Is it not a fact of life that those statutes contributed, at least in part, and in substantial part, to the so-called housing patterns now that are used as an exemption basis?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, although it has always been my thought that the schools were put where the people were rather than the people being put where the schools are.

Mr. STENNIS. That is true, but New York, for instance, until 1938, I think it was, still had a statute that permitted separate schools.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. Indiana had a statute as late as about 1950—maybe a few years later—that permitted and at one time required separate schools. My real point is, How do they exempt those States, without exempting the South, from their rules?

Mr. ALLEN. That is something the Senator from Alabama does not understand, either.

Mr. STENNIS. Still they claim exemptions for their States under their rules, do they not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. The Senator from Alabama would like to point out that until 1954 the dual systems and any statutes regarding the dual systems were not unconstitutional.

Mr. STENNIS. As a matter of fact, those statutes were firmly and expressly held to be legal.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. STENNIS. Those laws requiring segregation of the races were upheld as late as 1928, in a unanimous opinion written by Chief Justice of the United States Taft, a former President of the United States, who was presiding. Is that not true?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, that is correct.

Mr. STENNIS. So if there is any opprobrium attached to any State that once had such laws, certainly they were under the scrutiny of the Supreme Court of the United States all that time, and they were repeatedly held to be valid until, of course, 1954.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes. I would like to point out to the Senator that some of the housing patterns came about as a result of the requirements of the Federal Housing Administration.

Mr. STENNIS. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator knows that before the Federal Housing Administration would insure a proposed FHA loan, they would check the title, see if there were restrictions in that subdivision, and if there were, it was a matter of routine to put the racial covenant in the FHA approved loan, forbidding minority groups from residing in that particular area. So the Government itself has contributed to the housing pattern.
